ness by the U.S. Department of Agriculture must be accurately labeled. Check the label to guide you in preparing the ham.

For example, hams labeled as 'smoked" are heated to an internal temperature of 140 degrees. This is more than sufficient to insure complete protection against the danger of getting trichinosis, according to meat inspectors of USDA's Consumer and Marketing Services.

However, smoked hams still need additional cooking before serving, for the same reason that you would cook any meat before eating.

Hams labeled as being "fullycooked" are heated to an internal temperature of about 150 degrees Fahrenheit. Again, this is sufficient to kill any trichina.

It is also sufficient to cook the ham so that it requires no additional heating before serving, although you may want to heat it if you desire hot food.

Hams produced under the supervision of C&MS meat inspectors are carefully checked throughout the entire curing process. Records are kept on the weight of the fresh ham; the amount of curing mixture injected; the length of time and internal temperature while in the smokehouse; and the final weight of the ham.

This constant supervision is designed, in part, to protect the consumer against mislabeled products. To be labeled as "ham" under USDA requirements, meat must be "shrunk" while in the smokehouse back to its original fresh weight before the curing solution was injected. If they do not come down to their fresh weight, the hams are returned for further heating and shrinking, or must be labeled as "Ham, Water Added" or "Imitation Ham."

Products labeled as "Ham, Water added" may contain up to 10% added moisture, while those labeled as "Imitation Ham" contain anything over 10%. Such labeling insures that you know what you are buying when you buy these hams

At the retail fresh meat counter, smoked and/or fully-cooked hams are sold whole, or often cut in
