Use Vegetable Plants To Beautify Home

Vegetable plants grown in the flower bed may be just the thing to dress up your surroundings as well as putting food on the table. Many so-called vegetable plants make beautiful additions to the ornamentals around the house.

Tomatoes were grown as ornamentals long before they were grown for food. Today, as long ago, red tomatoes on the vine would add to the looks of the home if they were "espallered" (trained on a rail or trellis) along a wall.

The Kentucky Wonder string bean can be used to put a nice green cover on a fence. Wires or stakes may be used to train the vines to the fence. Many garden plants make excellent borders for the more conventional ornamentals. Asparagus spears may be used for the table in early spring and the remaining ferns make an excellent summer background for flowering petunias, zinnias and annuals.

In addition to its beautiful purple-blue flower, the large artistically designed leaves of the globe artichoke make it a beautiful foundation plant. The delicate foliage of the carrot make an excellent border to place in front of taller, flowering annuals. Beets, swisschard and curly leaf mustard could also be used in this way.

Garden plants make good cover for those nongrass areas of the yard. Melons, cucumbers, pumpkins and watermelons can all be used to do something different with those hard to cover spots. These plants all require lots of sunlight. Acorn and butternut squash make good temporary ground covers in these areas also. So be different. Dress up your yard as well as your table. And besides, what would taste better than vegetables grown in your own flowerbed?

Tips On Growing Cactus In The Home

Thinking of a plant to grow in the home? Try cactus. Cacti tolerate low humidity, high temperature and extended periods without water. You can enjoy their unique beauty throughout the year and leave on short vacations without bothering to arrange for their care while you are away.

The cactus family contains over 10,000 species varying in size from an inch to 65 feet tall. Most of them seem to have originated in Mexico and the southwestern United States or in the Andes mountains of Bolivia and Peru. Many miniature forms are available that make for fine indoor plants.

Cactus plants have fleshy stems which serve as moisture storage structures. They usually have ribs which gives stiffness and permit shrinking during periods of drought. The plants are protected from water loss by a layer of wax.

Stems of most species of cacti are protected by small clusters of spines. These may be white, yellow, red, brown or black. Contrary to some belief they are not poisonous. The attractive cactus flowers have a ring of waxy petals around a cluster of stamens (male parts of flowers). They occur in many colors including white, shades of yellow, pink, red, blue and violet.

Now is a good time to start cactus in the home since the plants begin their active period of growth in the spring. Cacti may be started from seeds or cuttings. Seeds may be sown in spring or early summer in any good well-drained potting soil placed in a small container covered with glass or film to retain humidity. Cuttings may also be taken at this time using a sharp knife to leave a smooth surface. They form roots quite readily from cut surfaces, prostrate stems and individual small side shoots. The roots absorb water rapidly during showers but cannot tolerate constant moisture.

Select shallow containers for cactus plants with a layer of coarse charcoal or gravel in the bottom to provide drainage. Use moist, light porous soil containing about one-half sand. Don't water for about two weeks to reduce the possibility of root rot developing.

Small specimens may be transplanted yearly and large ones about every three years when the plants fill the pot. Use leather gloves to protect your fingers. Cactus plants need several hours of direct sunlight per day so locate the collection in a sunny southwest window.

Watering the plants two or three times a week during the spring growing period is advised. Reduce watering to about once each week in July and August. Increase the frequency of watering during fall and decrease to none in November and during the winter rest period.

Cactus need little fertilizer. The young plants should receive moderate applications of a low nitrogen house plant fertilizer every two weeks during May, June and July. Mature plants should receive this treatment weekly.
