Anderson Is For Progress

To The News:

Possibly our editor thinks there has been enough said for the present on the subject of patronizing mail order houses, so in this article I will not have much to say about the mail order business, I merely want to enlarge a little on some of the suggestions made in a recent article in the News from "A Subscriber."

In said article he says many good things and among them is his exhortation for unity of effort on the part of the people for the advancement and upbuilding of our town and country, which is an element almost absolutely necessary to the accomplishment of the best ends in public enterprises. "United we stand; divided we fall."

Also, his admonition to fellowship and brotherly love, a condition very much to be desired at all times and under all circumstances.

He touched the key note in his statement that we are a progressive people living in a progressive age—"old things have passed away and all things have become new". There was a time in the years long passed and almost forgotten when the crossroads country merchant could very easily meet the demands of the people because their demands were very much limited. Bill Smith could get married, take his father's old car and twenty-five or thirty dollars, go down to the crossroads village and get a full set of farming tools and complete housekeeping outfit, take them back in the old cart, happy as a June lark, thinking he had all he needed—his wife thinking the same. Such is not the case now. New inventions have brought new demands and new demands have brought many new necessities.

Yes, we are a progressive people, living in a fast developing country in a progressive age, and what we need and desire is a progressive town, keeping abreast of the advance guard of a progressive people in a progressive age. Not a town that HAD a gin, an elevator and a crusher four or five years ago, but a town that HAS these things now, with up-to-date machinery capable of handling the products of the country to the best advantage possible that the farmers may be able to economically handle their stuff so that they might have more money to spend with their home merchants. Not a town that begs the mercies of a mail-order-patronizing public, but a town that gets their heads together and devises means and plans to bring about a condition that will entirely eliminate all excuse and profit in the mail order business.

The people are chuck full of liberality but the weakest pulse in their liberal anatomy beats through the vein running the closets around their money purse. We do not appeal to the business men of our town to help us get a good price for our produce from a charitable standpoint but from a strictly business standpoint—upon the bases of good, sound, business judgment—that it might not enure to the benefit of the farmer only, but to the profit of the business man as well.

When a farmer living in a good farming country, almost in the edge of a town the size of McLean, furnished with as fine shipping facilities as is furnished by the Rock Island System, has to take his time and double the amount of teams necessary to haul to his own town and haul his cotton through the breaks and a quick-sand river twenty-five miles into the country and away from the railroad in order to find machinery to put it into marketable shape, and then find a better market for it than he would find at home, somebody; yes, I might say everybody, acknowledge there is something radically wrong and it ought to be righted as soon as possible for the best interest of our town and country.

You know it is pretty trying on a fellow's charitable disposition when he is forced by his own town to go that far out of his way to get to market his stuff—finding goods as cheap as he gets them at home—to drive four mules and an empty wagon back home and make an extra trip to town to get what he needs.

We are willing to acknowledge the partial truthfulness of the statement that the people of this present day are sometimes wanting things they do not need but we are not treating that phase of the subject just now. What we are praying and writing for now is the burning needs of our present situation. When we see a people putting a ten or fifteen dollar hat on a two-bit head, a twenty-five or thirty dollar suit on a fifteen-cent boy and a twenty-five or thirty dollar dress on a badly strained store account, then we acknowledge a practice that will finally work disaster to the individual and a detriment to the people, the country and the merchant. This is not in keeping with the lines of progress, but a desperate effort on the part of the commonality of the people to keep in line with demands of the upper or higher society to their own downfall and discomfort which works a condition that ought not so to be.

Subscriber says, "Show me a town where the people do not patronize the mail order houses and I will show you a live, prosperous town." True. But with equal emphasis and the same degree of certainty I can say, "Show me a town that meets the demands of a progressive people and I will show you a town that is not bothered but very little with the mail order business, and in that same town I will show you the town that Subscriber was going to show you—a live, prosperous town."

I still think we ought not to, and admonish the people not to, patronize the mail order houses when it can reasonably be avoided. Spend your money at home thereby helping to build a town that we are proud of. I still hope and believe that our conditions will show a marked improvement by the time another season comes on. McLean has many good things already to be proud of. Among them a splendid local paper, ably edited by a

SCHOOL ECONOMY.

THE sudden termination of the local schools after a short term of six months has brought a realization of the fact that even educational pride and advancement can be carried too far. No one seems to doubt that the directors of the schools affairs had any other idea in mind than the upbuilding of a school second to none, but it seems that in their efforts to secure the best talent and the most efficient force they have overstepped the limit of their available funds.

As to maintaining the efficiency of the crops of teachers we heartily agree with them, but looking at it from the standpoint of a patron we are of the opinion that fewer teachers could possibly handle the work until such time as the property assessment and scholastics of the district will admit of a greater expenditure in this particular department.

While it is true that the district has been woefully in debt and the termination of the school after only six months of the present term will leave it free from this embarrassing condition, yet there is a question if the funds available for the purpose will be sufficient to maintain a nine months term another year with the services of eight teachers.

One thing is apparent—the school will have to be conducted at less expense or the term cut short. There is a problem and we believe the present board is fully able and willing to solve it.

Now that the south pole has been discovered and the disagreeable weather settled the people of the McLean country have their minds sufficiently relieved to begin plowing for their spring crops.

To Prepare The Seed Bed

Water:—It is hardly necessary to state that plants require water, not in minute but in very substantial quantities. It requires about three hundred pounds of water to make one pound of dry material or to mature an average acre of corn or grain it requires from four to six hundred tons of water. The soil water, holding in solution plant food, is carried through the plant, performs its functions and is evaporated through the leaves. Soil moisture, together with humus, equalizes in great measure soil temperatures, dissolves chemical elements and distributes them, and in a great measure contributes to the life and activity of the soil.

Water is found in the soil in three forms, namely—

- (1) Hydrostatic, or gravitational.
(2) Capillary water.
(3) Hygroscopic, or vapor water.

Hydrostatic Water:—Hydrostatic water is the water that falls on the surface in the form of rains or by artificial irrigation. If this water exists in excessive amounts and percolates slowly, saturating the soil to the extent of filling the air spaces between the particles of soil for a period, thereby driving out the air, it works disaster to the crop. If, however, the ground is of good tilth, and the seed bed is deep and free from hard pan, the downward movement is sufficiently rapid to prevent smothering plant. If a hard pan exists, which is rarely the case where deep plowing is practiced, but is usually found where the practice is to plow shallow, the soil remains saturated, rendering it cold, sour and lifeless. Deep plowing and subsoiling where it is needed are usually sufficient to properly take care of ordinary rainfalls.

Capillary Water:—Capillary water is the reverse of hydrostatic water in its movements. Water is stored in the deeper subsoils and by the process of attraction it moves upward, passing from soil particle to soil particle, enveloping each with a film of moisture, until the surface is reached. This water dissolves plant food elements and distributes them. It also forms chemical combinations, making plant food compounds, and holds them in solution until they are utilized by the plant. The root hairs, or food and water gathers, pass between the soil particles throwing out their minute tentacles, which wrap around the particles of soil, absorbing by the process of osmosis nourishment and sending it through the plant arteries performing its functions of life and growth.

It is needless to say to the observing farmer that this process is not carried on in saturated soil, for but few farmers have not observed the absence of a crop where water has stood or the ground has been completely saturated for any considerable length of time.

Hygroscopic Water:—Hygroscopic water is the moisture that is found on soil particles but is not subject to movement either by gravity or by capillary attraction. More or less moisture exists in the air, enters the soil and adheres to the particles. This water probably plays little or no part in dissolving or distributing plant food, but at the same time it quenches in a measure the thirst of sun-burned plants in semi-arid regions.

Plant Food:—Food is just as essential to the growth of the plant as water; in fact, they are interdependent, and it must be remembered that the ability and amount of plant food depends to a great extent upon the condition of the seed bed. If the plants receive their food from the seed bed, it stands to reason that a deep bed would contain more food than a shallow one. It is also plain that plant roots seek the course of least resistance and their abundance, energy and strength depend upon the freedom they have and the amount of nourishment provided for them. Hence, it should require no argument to convince the farmer of the advantages of a deep, thoroughly made seed bed, well stocked with the elements that go to make a balanced ration, and keep in mind the fact that the availability of plant food depends upon the chemical and physical condition of the soil.

Plant food compounds (and all the elements must be resolved into compounds) are made by the union of inorganic base elements with acids, and the work is accomplished by the action of air, water, bacteria and humus.

We have discussed the problems of air and water, and will now consider bacteria and humus as factors in making the seed bed productive.

Plant food elements must, before they can be utilized, undergo changes, and right here the phenomena of plant development is very exacting. Organic matter in the soil is essential. Through the action of one form of soil bacteria it is torn to pieces and passed through a process of decay, forming carbonic acid and ammonia substances instrumental in dissolving inorganic material and forming chemical combinations. The organic materials are charged by bacteria and chemicals into humate, another substance absolutely essential—in fact, a prominent ingredient in fertility, but rather as a vehicle than a component part of plant food. Specific soil bacteria have specific duties to perform, and if conditions are not right, the chain of charges is broken and the plant food is not made available.

Continued Next Week.

The Mothers, Club have a number of splendid programs prepared and will begin a series of entertainments as soon as the weather is settled.

Help! Help!

You help me and I'll help you. If I help you it will help me, too. Give me a list of your land, your farm. If I can't sell it there will be no harm. But if I can a deal pull through. It will help me and will help you, too. I'll list your property just at your price. With terms and payments at your advise. Your city property and livestock, too. And do my best to pull a deal through. I sell land straight at five per cent. If I can't sell it it wont cost you a cent. So come around and list your land. And I will sell it if I can. Good prospects don't always win. But if one fails I will try again. Go find another and make it stick. And this I'll do if I can right quick.
