GRADY HAZLEWOOD

HOW TO SCORE A 160,000 MILE BULLSEYE - Astronaut Walter M. Schirra Jr. left nothing to chance on his history-making space flight. He was watching as his SIGMA 7 space capsule, the candy-striped retro-rocket package strapped to the heat shield, was hoisted (1) to the top of the gantry at Cape Canaveral. He checked progress as technicians gingerly lowered (2) the capsule into position atop the Atlas booster, closely observing his all-important "brakes." Enclosed in the candy-striped dome, the "brakes" consist of three small bucket-size solid fuel Thiokol retro-rocket engines each 12 inches in diameter and 15.5 inches long. Their performance brought to a successful climax Schirra's six-orbit flight which had started at 8:15 AM(EDT) Oct. 3 with a spectacular blastoff (3) from the launch site. At 5:07 PM(EDT) the retros fired in perfect sequence, burning for about 11 seconds. Together they generated sufficient reverse thrust to slow the capsule velocity by about 500 feet per second, thus easing SIGMA 7 out of its orbital path. Owing to the performance of the pilot, capsule, "brakes" and the large supporting team, Walter Schirra splashed safely into the Pacific 21 minutes later, having scored an almost-perfect bullseye after a flight covering 160,000 miles. Schirra climbed (4) out of his capsule at 6:15 PM(EDT) abroad the carrier Kearsarge to the cheers of the Navy crew.
