STILL GOING WESTWARD

The great migration across the plains to the far west ended several decades ago. The empty places are pretty well filled, and most of the homesteaders have become old-timers on the lands of their choosing.

Just the same, it would be a mistake to assume that the country has settled down to a static condition in which change is over. Profound shifts and alterations are taking place now, just as they were in the days when white-topped wagons went creaking west to Oregon; the difference is that now they are not so spectacular.

A recent dispatch from Washington by Kenneth Watson reveals the fact that agriculture is undergoing a very fundamental change of base—a change that is apparently still a part of the great westward migration of the last generation, and which undoubtedly has something to do with the present depression in farm produce prices.

Thus it is revealed that the movement from farm to city still continues. There are fewer farms in the country today than there were in 1920. On an average, 400,000 farmers a year have been abandoning the struggle.

But a closer examination of the figures is even more interesting. For instance: while the number of farms decrease, there are certain states where it is increasing materially. In Utah, for instance, the number of farms has risen by five per cent in the last five years. In Arizona the increase is nearly 33 per cent. Nebraska and Minnesota show healthy increases. Wyoming shows a gain; so do Nevada and North Dakota.

The decreases, on the other hand, are largely in the east and south. Thus New York state shows a 17 per cent decrease; Ohio, one of 14 per cent; Georgia, one of 17 per cent; Pennsylvania, 14 per cent; New Jersey, 17 per cent; New Hampshire, 27 per cent; Massachusetts, 20 per cent; Connecticut, 22 per cent; South Carolina, 18 per cent; Indiana, 11 per cent.

Dissecting these statistics in this way indicates that what is happening is not simply a country-wide shrinkage in farm areas. It is, in some ways, more like a continuance of the old movement westward. The states showing the highest decreases are chiefly the states where industrial development has been greatest. The farm belt is contracting, to be sure, but it is also rearranging its boundaries; and this rearrangement may, in the long run, prove more important than the contraction.

WAGES UP, COSTS DOWN

Workers in the building trades enjoy, on the average, very high wages. Very often people who complain of high building costs blame these wages, and assert that everything would be lovely if only the wages could be materially reduced.

A recent bulletin from the Austin Company of Cleveland, one of the largest industrial construction firms in the country, does not seem to agree with this thesis, however.

The Austin Company reports that industrial building costs today are the lowest in eight years. Except for a period in 1922, they have not been so low since 1916. The bulletin remarks:

"All of the decline is due largely to falling prices of materials and greater efficiency of labor and construction equipment. Wage rates at 185 per cent over the 1913 level continue at the peak for all time, while all building costs, including labor, are less than 40 per cent over 1913."

Which would seem to be a pretty fair answer to the attempt to blame union labor for high construction prices.

Daily Washington Letter By Rodney Dutcher

Herein Lies Many a Tale of 1,000-000-Year-Old Trees, Fish Steered by Electricity, 250-Foot Snowfalls, Buttermilk-Bait and Triplets Worth $60,000 Per Set

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19. — Mr. William Atherton Du Puy, the author, who is executive assistant to the secretary of the interior, has returned from a tour of reclamation projects in the northwest with a gob of plain and fancy information about trees 1,000,000 years old, fish steered by electricity, 250-foot snowfalls, fishermen who use buttermilk for bait and a place where triplets are worth $60,000 per set.

Mr. Du Puy did not bring back any fish or any snow or any triplets, but he did bring a piece of wood a million years old and it is on his desk.

In the Yakima valley in the state of Washington the Bureau of Reclamation is carrying out one of the world's finest irrigation projects, which may come to cover as many as 600,000 acres.

While digging a tunnel down under the river bed, straight through a mass of ancient lava, the engineers ran into a log. Apparently the lava had been cooling when it enveloped the tree so that the tree wasn't burnt up as generally happens in such cases. The engineers took samples of the wood to geologists and the geologists said it was from a redwood tree and must be 1,000,000 years old. It would be very difficult for anyone to prove otherwise.

Mr. Du Puy got up on the eastern side of the Cascade mountains, in the region of the Yakima headwaters, and they told him that about 250 feet of snow fell there each year. Naturally, he said they were liars. Later he withdrew the aspersion. This snow is fresh, fluffy stuff. Moisture-laden winds blow in from the Pacific and precipitate as they get into the cold high altitude, creating all that snow. The snow-water is what irrigates the Yakima valley.

The engineers made irrigation canals leading off the river and then found that fish were swimming into these canals and dying by the thousands in shallow water. This seemed no way to do for a government which believes in keeping fish alive and propagating them. Besides, all the dead fish improved neither the water nor the atmosphere. Nets were put in and those got clogged up with moss and one thing and another.

Then the engineers sank a series of steel chains in the outlets, charged with electricity. Now, whenever a fish is tempted to swim into an irrigation canal he gets within five or six feet of a chain and begins to tingle and feel uncomfortable. So he just keeps right on swimming along the river.

At an altitude of 10,000 feet in the Yakima headwaters zone there is a deep mountain lake. Innumerable fish had been poured into it on the theory that they would propagate and there would be good fishing. But nobody ever caught any fish.

So one day a bright person went out in a rowboat with the theory that the fish were all asleep way down in the bottom of the lake, too far down to be aware of all the nice bait being offered them. He took along a can of buttermilk and a sack of bran, which he poured and dumped gradually over the side. He sat a couple of hours and began to get some bites on his line. The stuff had percolated to the bottom and aroused active interest among the fishes. Now everyone out there fishes with bran; it has been discovered that the fish don't demand buttermilk.

On the Klamath Indian reservation in Oregon, Mr. Du Puy discovered the world's most valuable group of babies. There are some 1200 Klamath babies by far the most profitable occupation open to them and they have applied themselves to the industry with earnest determination and encouraging results. White men have let the cattle business to marry Klamath women and the most common prayer that goes up from the reservation is the plea for twins.

And now the editor of this paper is trying to rake up kinship with Mark Barron, Texan born and bred, who is now writing "About New York" columns for a string of papers. It seems that this Mark Barron is becoming a famous writer and the Midland editor doesn't see how two such writers could have the same name without being related. Mark wrote the play, "Gentlemen of the Press," but from all available records had no reference to the local editor bearing his name.

All right, you baseball fans, as soon as you can get your minds off of the Dixie series, you may as well be picking out a place to stand on Missouri street, because we're going to have the old board working play by play during the World Series. The only way to keep us from staging a baseball party will be for every player on both teams to run into something like Rhem of the Cardinals did, and be forced to stay off on a prolonged drunk. I'll bet there are men right here in town that could be kidnapped and forced to stay drunk for 24 hours.

Then I got balled up and wrote Bum Cowden up for losing his temper on the golf course and heard later it was Myrl Jowell. I've been warned that one more crack about either Chunky or Bum may land me in the gutter, but they'll have to find me first.

Midland Girl to See Typing Champ

Entered against 27 other typing champions from the United States and Canada, Evelyn Garlington, Midland high school student, will compete for the world's novice speed championship in the 25th annual International Typewriting contest at Richmond, Va., next week.

Miss Garlington won the 1930 Texas school novice title in a statewide contest, turning in an average of 68 words a minute in the standard 15-minute test. The championship earned her an invitation to the International tournament from the Underwood Typewriting company.

With the other state title holders, she will spend four days in Richmond and Washington, D. C., in a tour of historic buildings and shrines. The novices will compete for the world's championship school cup, the Alfred E. Smith trophy and individual medals.

The world's professional contest, in which George Hossfeld, of Paterson, N. J., will defend his title, is the crowning event of the Richmond keyboard classic. Hossfeld set a new world's typing record of 135 words a minute at Toronto last year.

A last field of contestants has entered the other tournament division, the amateur class, to battle for the Governor C. C. Young trophy and the world championship title.

Baseball Owes Beginning to Boys' Game Of "Aunty Over," in Boston, 100 Years Ago

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the first of a series of six articles on the origin and development of baseball, which is 100 years old this year.

By GEORGE C. MORELAND, Written Especially for NEA Service (Copyright, 1930, NEA Service, Inc.)

It is a far cry from a world's series to a couple of barefooted kids tossing a ball of yarn over a barn way back in 1830. The two have about as much in common as a mosquito and a cobra. But the great game of baseball, with its tremendous crowds, its high-salaried players and its millions of devotees, traces its ancestry directly back to just such a kid's game of catch.

Baseball was born just 100 years ago—born in a casual game of "aunty over" played by two youngsters in Boston. If you wanted to use fancy language you could say that Babe Ruth, Ty Cobb and all the other baseball immortals were trapped up in that yarn ball that went spinning over the barn roof that summer afternoon in 1830.

For here is what happened: One of the boys, moved by some impulse, impulsively picked up a stick and socked the ball instead of catching it, knocking it over into a vacant lot.

This, the world's first home run, carried a thrill to the hitter. He kept the other kid tossing balls to him—hot over the barn, now—while he whacked them with the stick. This looked like good fun, so presently the other kid took his turn at bat. And out of this game grew baseball—through a long, devious and occasionally unrecognizable childhood.

All of this comes to me at first hand from the one man on earth who should have known the truth about baseball's beginnings—General Abner Doubleday. Many years ago I talked with General Doubleday and drew from him the whole history of the origin of baseball! I did this while a baseball writer in 1891 in Pittsburgh. At that time I wrote the history of the game, only from 1845 on, when it assumed something resembling its present form. Now, however, I am going back to its very infancy.

General Doubleday was in on it from the beginning. In 1830 he was a student in Boston. At that time he began to notice the boys of the neighborhood playing a new game. They called it "round ball," and when he questioned them told him how they had developed it themselves from that two-handed game of "aunty over."

Now "round ball" doesn't much resemble modern baseball. But it was played with a ball, bat and bases, and it is baseball's real starting point. Here is the way General Doubleday described it:

"The bases were called posts. There were four of them. real posts stuck in the ground, about three feet high, arranged in the form of a square, and numbered one, two, three and four, in rotation. Number four was what we now call the home plate.

"However, the batter—the boys then called him 'the striker'—did not stand at home plate, or at the fourth base as they called it. He stood halfway between fourth and first, facing toward the middle of the square. The 'tossor,' ancestor of the pitcher, stood inside the square about 15 feet away from him. I should add, here, that there was no rule about the distance between the posts; it depended chiefly on the size of the vacant lot or field the kids had to play in.

"The tosser threw the ball underhanded, not very hard. The striker's bat was a long stick, with a flat surface at the end. He swung it with one hand, and if he failed to hit the ball with his first strike he was out—provided that the catcher, stationed some 20 feet behind him, caught the ball either in the air or on first bounce.

"Round ball had infielders and outfielders, only the infielders were called 'postmen' and the outfielders were called 'scouts.' When the striker hit the ball he ran for first base, just as in modern baseball, and went on to the other bases if he could, scoring when he reached fourth base. He was out if one of the postmen or scouts caught the ball in the air or on first bounce, or if any of the players could hit him or touch him with it while he was between the posts.

"Regardless of the number of men in the field, there were only three batters, and if the first batter failed ed to score from third on the last batter's effort he was out.

"The expression 'out, by the way, came from the fact that the striker went 'out' to the field when his hit was caught or he was tagged between the bases. There was no rotation, as there is in the modern kids' game of scrub; the player who made the out came in to bat, and the batter who had been put out replaced him in the field.

"Thus, obviously, it wasn't a team affair. It was strictly an individual game, each man for himself. There was no umpire, majority rule settling all disputed questions. The posts, by the way, that did duty for bases usually had little flags on top, because these fields where the game was played often had such long grass that otherwise the posts could not have been seen easily."

So baseball got its start, a century ago, tracing its ancestry back to "round ball" and thence to that game of "aunty over." It all started when that Boston kid discovered how much fun it is to hit a ball with a bat.

But just suppose that lad had missed!

Army Camp at Angelo Exposition

SAN ANGELO, Sept. 19.—Fort D. A. Russell at Marfa, will be represented at the 35th Annual West Texas exposition at the San Angelo fairgrounds Sept. 22 to 27, by a platoon of the First Cavalry, which will arrive in San Angelo Saturday to establish camp and make preparations to take part in the six days program.

A model army camp, which will be established on the Exposition grounds, will be headquarters of the Fort D. A. Russell platoon. Demonstrations in modern attack methods with machine guns and automatic rifles, Guidon relay races, Cossack rescue races, and numerous other maneuvers will be given before the grandstand by the visiting cavalrymen. A complete change of program will be made for each performance, according to information received here from Captain Shirley.

MATTY GETS QUARTER

COLLEGE STATION, Texas, Sept. 19.—Little Harry Stiteler, Smithville, 137-pound candidate for quarterback, is proving one of the sensations of the pre-season training period in the camp of Coach Matty Bell's Texas Aggie gridsters. Despite his size, Stiteler is an excellent ball-carrier and punter and is considered one of the most accurate passers on the Aggie squad. He was field general of the Cavalry grid eleven in the intramural football league at A. & M. last year and as a member of the varsity track team set a new Southwest conference record of 13 feet 1-2 inch in the pole vault.

Clovis, of the line of Merovingians, was the first king of France. He ascended the throne in the year 481 A. D.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19. (AP).—Postoffice department mail experts met today to prepare a tentative schedule for the new Atlanta-Los Angeles route...

Wadsworth said he could make no prediction as to what New Mexico and Arizona cities would be designated stops. Refueling might be a deciding factor.

The route, as now described, merely specifies that it is to run from Atlanta by way of Birmingham, Dallas, Fort Worth and El Paso...

Wadsworth pointed out that, because the route is unlighted, only daylight flying can be done for the present, but the schedule must be planned with a view to night flying later.

The question also was raised whether the route could be operated at a financial advantage if too many stops are included.
