to stay married.

There are young couples in love today who can't marry because they can't get jobs, have had pay cuts, or are caring for dependent relatives. And others with too much money and too little to think about go in for foolish extravagances and senseless gaiety that lead to scandals and broken homes.

Aunt Lucy, reading about these goings-on, is likely to purse her lips, shake her head, and say, "My, my! What's marriage coming to?'

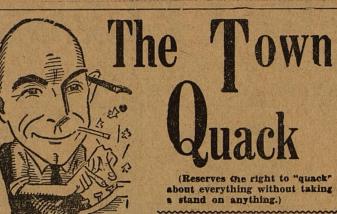

Which is silly. Arguing about whether the state of holy matrimony is going to endure is just as sensible as arguing whether a person should eat when he's hungry which is slow at paying its bills. Which is silly. Arguing about whether the state of or rest when he's tired.

Of course marriage is going to endure. It's a fundamental of civilization.

True, there have been changes. Wives have property rights today. They and their husbands have more freedom in going where they like and doing what they like than did their grandparents. Some wives even do not use their husbands' names.

But what of it? By far the great majority are in the background, quietly working out their problems as these problems arise. They're accepting new liberties and new responsibilities, and with old-fashioned forbearance and courage and love, they're solving these problems, fash-
