CORN 6 INCHES HIGH

Oscar King of ten miles north of Tahoka, was a caller at the News office Tuesday. He says he has corn six inches high and maize that will be ready to plow out by the last of the week. The corn came up to such a good stand that he will have to plow up every other row. As soon as the corn gets its growth he will

Mystery of the Double Cross

FIRST EPISODE

The Lady in No. 7.

Two events, neither of which he could foresee, broke into the pleasure trip of Peter Hale while he was amusing himself jaunting over Europe in August, 1914—one was the news of his father's death, the other the declaration of war which set the world afire.

The former was a heart-breaking blow to Peter, for he and his father had been genuine friends and comrades.

The fact that Mr. Hale, Sr., had been a multimillionaire did not enter Peter's thoughts. For mere money he did not care in the least.

Immediately on receipt of the cablegram announcing the sad news Peter secured a passage on the Huron.

For the first few days after leaving the Irish Channel everyone on board was too busy getting settled to pay much attention to anyone else, but gradually there seeped through the first cabin the hint of a mystery aboard the Huron. And to add to the interest in this mystery it had to do with a beautiful but as yet unseen young lady who occupied stateroom No. 7.

"Why," asked the older women who sat in steamer chairs and discussed this bit of gossip with avidity, "should the lady keep herself concealed? Why did she have her meals served in her stateroom? Why did she always wear a veil?" and so on and so forth.

It was no wonder that these questions communicated themselves to the men, who as all the world knows, are just as curious as women about most things and more curious about beauty, especially when embodied in femininity.

The upshot of the matter was an animated argument of the matter among half a dozen deck friends, among whom was Peter. The question admitted of many interpretations and had the additional merit of becoming more animated the longer it was discussed. Finally Ralph Cruger appealed to Hale directly: "Say, of course you must have seen her? Why, her stateroom is right across from yours."

This challenge centered all eyes on Peter. But he shook his head, and his sincerity impressed Cruger sufficiently to call forth a proposition which won instant approval from all present: "I'll bet a champagne dinner," said Cruger "that I see this lovely siren face to face before evening."

Mr. Cruger considered, and then mapped out a plan of action which ran something like this: He would station himself near Hale's room and watch for the exit of the strange lady, and then follow her. What could be more simple?

Consequently he sought a sheltered angle of the passage, and after a long wait was rewarded by the sudden opening of the door of No. 7.

From the stateroom there emerged a cloaked figure which moved swiftly toward the upper deck. Mr. Cruger started in pursuit, lured on by the flashing vision of a pair of slender ankles incased in white silk stockings. The figure fled just ahead, and proceeding rapidly vanished behind some lifeboats and disappeared. The disappointed young man looked everywhere; his search was in vain. Humiliated and disgusted, but undaunted he again took up his watch and again he was rewarded by the vision of the figure emerging and making for the upper deck. This time he determined that she should not escape. He followed her closely, saw her sink into a chair on a remote part of the deck, and, creeping up behind her so silently that she could not hear him, paused to assume a beneficent smile, and bending cautiously over, finally brought his eyes to a level with hers.

Startled, she turned suddenly and they met face to face. Cruger uttered a stifled cry. He was looking into the grinning features of a negro maid. He backed away almost overcome, and supporting himself against a ladder, burst into a fit of laughter.

He had lost his bet, but he had also made a discovery.

Meanwhile, Fate was busy in another part of the ship—the wireless operator was stretching himself and wondering how soon it would be before the seas were a closed book, when the clicking of the key announced the beginning of a message.

He took it down listlessly, for it began like thousands of other messages, but when he reached the end, he stared at the written words and then stared again, for surely here was a puzzle. He had heard of the mysterious lady in No. 7, but here was something even more mysterious. He resolved to deliver the marconigram in person.

Still wondering he knocked at the stateroom door and with his eyes on the message waited till it was opened. He then looked up. "A message for you, sir," and stopped short, for he was gazing into the bluest eyes he had ever seen. "Oh, I beg your pardon—this message is for Mr. Peter Hale—No. 8—" He saw that he had mistaken the stateroom No. 7 for the one across, and, with a further apology, he moved off and knocked on the door opposite.

Peter was dressing for dinner. He opened the door and the operator delivered the message.

Peter read: "If you have not as yet received the sign of the double cross, come at once upon your arrival in New York to the Hotel Astra and there read your father's will."

"I thought I'd better deliver it myself," the operator remarked, "especially as it seemed so queer—that part about the double cross."

"Well, you know as much about it as I do," the young man replied. "It's as much a puzzle to me as it is to you—thanks all the same."

The operator went back, but he did not notice as he passed that the door of No. 7 was slightly ajar and that the same pair of blue eyes that had so startled him was looking across the passage.

Peter read the message and re-read it—it meant nothing.

The more he puzzled the more he despaired of finding a solution and he flung the paper on the table with a petulance expressive of his perturbed state of mind.

He argued with masculine brevity that the best way to forget the whole affair was to eat, and proceeding on that theory he started for the dining room to partake of the feast provided by the rash Mr. Cruger.

It is the little things that set the big ones in motion. If Peter had not forgotten his handkerchief he might have landed in New York, still wondering what the double cross meant—but he did forget it, and without bothering to sit down, rushed back to his stateroom.

As he burst through the door he came face to face with the most beautiful girl it had ever been his good fortune to see—and he had seen hundreds in all the capitals of the world. Peter held his breath and gazed—the girl was too embarrassed to lift her eyes.

"I'm sure," he said, with a bow, "that whatever reason prompted you to honor me with a visit is a good reason."

The girl lifted her face. Never had Peter seen such eyes before. He felt a peculiar thrill running down his throat. Undoubtedly she was the ideal of his dreams.

Perhaps some of his admiration was betrayed in his glance, for the girl frankly held out the message she had picked up from the table.

"You've caught me—you see, I overheard the operator telling about the double cross, and it sounded so interesting. I thought I'd look, for myself."

"I see," said Peter, who didn't see at all.

He reached out for the message, and in doing so took her hand as well. "And may I ask your name?" asked the gallant young man.

She smiled at him. "You may."

"And it is?"

"Ah, that would be telling, wouldn't it?"

"Fair exchange is no robbery," replied Peter; "you know mine," and with his free hand he pointed to the address on the marconigram.

There was a twinkle in her eyes as she deserted the subject to ask a question on her own account. "Are we going to hold hands forever?"

The question pleased Peter—"Nothing would suit me better."

"Will you do me a favor?" she asked and Peter nodded.

"Please pick up my handkerchief." The young man released her hand and stooped; in a second his captive had escaped.

Peter looked at the handkerchief pensively. "I wonder," he said aloud, "whether handkerchiefs were meant to play an important part in my life." He returned to the dining room wondering whether to tell his less fortunate friends that without any effort on his part he had met the mysterious lady.

That matter was taken out of his hands, for no sooner was he seating than a frightened woman hugging a pet poodle came stumbling down the stairway shouting that terrible warning: "A submarine! A submarine!"

It was as though she had shouted "Fire." In a second the scene of geniality changed to a scene of panic. Men fought like animals to get on deck.

Peter had been borne on with the crush when the furious scramble began. Instantly his thoughts turned to the girl in No. 7. Probably she would be unaware of the danger.

Once on deck Peter found his progress more easy, for the mob was bound for the boats and he was bound away from them. Running to the rear of the ship and thence downstairs he dashed along the passage ways, now deserted, and arrived breathless at the door of No. 7. He did not knock. There was no time for formalities. He burst into the room, and trying to speak calmly, faced the frightened girl.

"Submarine," said Peter. "Get on these life belts, quick," and he knelt down and tore them out from under the sofa at the side of the room.

Hastily fastening them while the negro maid dashed wildly about, he seized the terrified girl's hand and almost dragged her toward the deck.

Every moment Peter expected to feel the Huron buckling, but he did his best to reassure the girl as they pressed toward the deck.

A few minutes earlier their paths would have been clear, but a new complication had arisen in the steerage. The immigrants had finished dinner; they were dancing; and was playing an accordion, others were clapping hands in time with the music. The forgetful that any moment the fateful torpedo might be launched that would send them both to the bottom he stepped closer to her.

Almost fiercely he put his arms about her and crushed her to him—their lips met—then a wild cry went up from the forward deck. The captain had been speaking through a megaphone. His shouted phrases were borne to them as they stood there. They caught the words "American" and "Stars and Stripes," and heard a cheer.

The danger was past. A great light shone in Peter's eyes. The girl freed herself.

"How can I thank you?" He heard the words and put out his hand, but she slipped away, and before he could follow had vanished.

Peter stood as one in a daze. Everywhere about him the passengers, hysterical now from joy where they had been hysterical from fright, were passing in twos and threes, while in the fading light the submarine, with the flag of Uncle Sam fluttering in the breeze, moved on her way to the renewed cheers of those aboard the Huron.

Peter went to his room, changed his collar and slipped on another coat, and then, returning to deck, he walked back and forth under the stars with the pieces of the puzzle in his mind which refused to be placed together in any satisfactory way.

But if the mystery of the double cross eluded his efforts at solution, he was sure of one thing, and that was his love for the beautiful occupant of No. 7.

Meanwhile he lived over the scene on deck when one blissful moment the girl had confessed in that rapturous kiss that his love for her no more than equalled hers for him.

But why, he asked himself should she have run away?

When he stepped into the smoking saloon on his way to bed he found Cruger and his other friends gathered noise above did not reach them, they did not hear the officers receiving orders from the captain to shoot the first man who tried to get on deck from the third cabin.

But bad news spreads fast. The dread cry fell like a bombshell among the crowded merry-makers and transformed them in a second into a mass of relentless, raging furies.

And Peter, emerging from below with the girl whose safety had suddenly become more precious to him than his life, met the first onrush of maddened immigrants, who had had no time to look for life belts. The law of might was become the law of right. Thus when one of the unfortunates saw Peter's companion equipped with life belts he made a wild plunge and with a snarl started to tear them from her slender body.

Peter aimed a careful blow and caught him on the jaw; he staggered, rolled to the side of the deck wall and lay there.

Peter forgot everything save that the girl might have been hurt by the rough handling of the furious immigrant. He turned to support her. She stood clinging to the iron rail, exhausted and terrified.

"You're not hurt?" His voice betrayed the solicitude he felt.

She managed to smile a little. "Oh, no. Thank you so much."

"But he's torn your gown." He started to take off his coat to wrap about her, when his eyes were caught by a strange thing on the fleshy upper part of her arm. It was distinct—yes, there could be no mistake—it was a double cross.

The girl saw his look and realized in a flash what he had seen. Like lightning she clapped her hand over the mark. She gazed at him in anguish, shrinking away. He caught her hand. "Who are you?" he asked. "What do you know of the double cross?"

She made no answer.

"Tell me," demanded Peter. "I have a right to know. What is your name? I will know."

Still she was silent.

Forgetful of the uproar about him,

He treated me...but I got no better. I got worse and worse until the misery was unbearable...I was in bed for three months and suffered such agony that I was just drawn up in a knot... I told my husband if he would get me a bottle of Cardui I would try it... I commenced taking it, however, that evening I called my family about me... for I knew I could not last many days unless I had a change for the better. That was six years ago and I am still here and am a strong woman, and I owe my life to Cardui. I had only taken two bottles when I began to feel better. The misery in my side got less until I had taken three bottles and did not need any more for I was and never felt better in my life, and have never had any trouble from that day to this." Those interested in the formation of a Lynn County Canning Club will meet in the office of County Judge Cain, over the Guaranty State Bank, Saturday, June 2nd.

Interest in the club has not been as enthusiastic as it might have been had garden conditions been better. But nevertheless the club should be organized for there is yet plenty of time to raise a fall garden for canning purposes. Staples, beans, peas, tomatoes, greens, spinich, potatoes, cabbage, etc., can be raised and canned before frost if planted by the fifteenth of this month.

Mrs. D. T. Rogers has some valuable data on canners, and methods of putting up garden products, which will be available for the clud.

By all means attend the meeting and get the Club started, the products to can will come later.

DAIRY COWS FOR PLAINS

It is estimated that by the end of 1917, there will be half a million dollars invested in dairy cattle on the South Plains. This wonderfully productive part of Texas, the banner state of the entire Southwest, is composed of plateau country five or six counties wide and ten deep, and comprises an area equal to that of Illinois.

This invasion of the dairy cow began on the north and central Plains in the fall of 1916, and since that time has spread to the entire Plains country. Lynn county has only recently awakened to the possibilities of the dairying industry, and registered and grape dairy stock are beginning to be numerous on our farms.

Unless we are greatly mistaken he has expressed himself as favoring bond issues for other public improvements, such as good roads, schools, etc. One of the chief reasons for the entrance of the U. J. E. Keever received a message Monday morning to the effect that his daughter, Mrs. W. C. Cowlin, had died at Snyder at four o'clock that morning. Mr. Keever and his family left early Monday for Snyder to attend the funeral. They returned Tuesday. Mr. and Mrs. Cowlin lived a few months in Lynn county a couple of years ago.

Judge J. L. Stokes of the Lynn County Land Co., came in a few days ago and pushed up the subscription of Ed. S. Duncan of Brighton, Texas, for a term of years. Ed. used to be one of the old timers around Tahoka and says he can't get along without the News.

Miss Fay Gooch returned Tuesday of last week from Canyon where she had been attending the West Texas State Normal.

The Star Theater and the Lynn County News have joined hands to give the people of Lynn county and Tahoka a bit of the newest drama that can be had. We refer to the booking of the "Mytery of the Double Cross" as it appears in this issue of the News and to be shown at the Star Monday night June 4th.

This thrilling drama began Monday night May the 14th for its first run at the Queen Theatre, Fort Worth, Texas. Three weeks behind Fort Worth in theatrical attractions is pretty well up-to-date. Don't fail to read this first installment in the News, you will read the other 15.

Carl Montgomery and E. T. Hines left on the Monday morning train. Carl goes to Abilene to enter the U. S. Navy and E. T. to his old home at Corsicana. We understand that E. T. will engage in the farming business.

The State of Texas, In the District Court County of Lynn, of Tarrant County, Texas. Monig Dry Goods Co., plaintiff, vs. Jack Alley Company and Jack Alley, defendants. Whereas, by virtue of an execution issued out of the District Court of Tarrant County, Texas, on a judgment rendered in said Court on the 9th day of March, 1911, in favor of the said Monig Dry Goods Company and against the said Jack Alley Company and Jack Alley, No. 11854 on the said Court, I did, on the 9th day 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m., levy on the following described tracts and parcels of land, situate in the County of Lynn, State of Texas, and belonging to the said Jack Alley, to-wit: all of lots Nos. 2, 5, and 6, in block No. 72, original town of Tahoka, Lynn County, Texas; and on the 3rd day of July, A. D. 1917, being the 1st Tuesday of said month, between the hours of 10 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m. on said day, at the court house door of said county, I will offer for sale and sell at public auction, for cash, all the right, title, and interest of the said Jack Alley in and to said property.
