TRAIL DUST

One of the eternal problems of human conduct is not being able to recognize in time, the source of overtures that come from Satan.

Some kind of a change may be taking place in the ranching industry. Recently I saw a pickup equipped with a cattle feeder in the back and two fishing rods and reels on the gun rack against the back window of the cab.

** My only apprehension at the thought of a drought's ending is the ensuing absence of a conversational subject.

Some of the modern building materials are not entirely new. The tow wall covering has been used before, perhaps less effectively as far as decor is concerned, but fully serviceable. Once when we lived in a large dugout my mother covered the walls and floor with tow sacking, driving long nails into the dirt to hold the material taut. We were not able to buy dye that might have added pastel effects.

Snow had filled the wagon ruts and the wind whipped it into point ed mounds against tall bunches of grass. The freight wagon driver walked on the south side of his teams and urged them into the quickening darkness along the high ridge and into a shallow vallev. He gathered a supply of wood from the mesquites before the night closed in, and quickly started a fire. The freighter unhitched his teams, removed the bridles and fed the animals from a sack of oats on the wagon. He made coffee in a small blackened pot ind cut a few slices of fat bacon into a skillet and took some hard biscuits from a brown paper sack. When the bacon was done he poured a small quantity of flour in the grease, added some water and stirred it into gravy. When his meal was finished he scrubbed the skillet with snow, then removed his boots, placed them beneath his tarpaulin, and wedged his way morrow he would continue to untamed land.
