AGING: BLAST OR BUST

FOR BOOMERS......
References to baby boomers (born after World War II) tend to be preceded by such words as "maturing," "graying" or "aging." A Bowling Green (Ohio) University professor says the boomers are a large and generally narcissistic group and are fascinated with whatever phase of life they are in. Problems of aging, as well as satisfactions of aging, will be around more because the boomers are experiencing them.

ng them.
Physical, behavioral, intellectual and emotional experiences at middle age set the stage for this group's adjusting to older adulthood. When physical changes such as baldness, bridges, bifocals, bulges and bunions are part of your physical being, middle science is upon you. Re-cliners and foot stools may have more appeal than sitting on the floor. Your behavior is not so negative that you yell at the kids playing in your yard, but you sure want to. It seems like a good idea to put a rubberband around your checkbook. Then when you stay up to watch the weather, you fall asleep during the commercial just before it comes on. There may even be some mysterious appeal to knee-high nylons or an attractions you've never before experienced to flat-heeled shoes. Men even find that hats protect their heads and are pleasant to wear while driving. Your appetite may savor a grilled-

Your mind tells you there is more and more to know and less and less worth knowing. Your work seems to improve if you have an afternoon nap, Even your financial skills sharpen. Keeping your money in a sock doesn't seem as stupid; it seems smarter than playing the stock-

Your emotions stabilize in middle age. Young adults admire your ability to stay calm-but since you've experienced almost everything, what can shock you? Getting your priorities straight seems to be important - like eating dessert first.

When you are middle age you can look around your home and truthfully say that you enjoy having all the family around you. It's easy to feel the pinch of the Grim Reaper trying to pull YOU on his side.

Lack of confidence is common and has many side affects. This is the first of two articles that will give general steps you can take to having more confidence.

1. Recognize your strengths and weaknesses - set your goals according to your strengths. For example, if you don't like people very much, a salesman job may not be the best for you.

Rex wants to thank all of the parents for allowing her to take your children to all of the tournaments. And to the members for not minding when she had to close the shop and take the kids to a tournament. And especially for asking about how all the kids did in the tournament. We rely on you for a lot of our support. She enjoyed spending time with everyone of the kids, and stated that she had never seen any kids that are more mannered or pleasant. She congratulates each one on their sportsmanship shown you are being rejected or put down.

5. Don't say bad things about yourself, like "studpid, ugly, failure," etc.
6. Don't allow others to criticize you as a person. They can evaluate your actions or performance, but not you as a person.

7. Remember, that failures and disappointments can be blessings in disguise. You may be avoiding a bigger let down

Boll weevil specialists from across Texas met in San Angelo this week to discuss the progress of an advanced computer-model for strategic managecomputer-model for strategic management of boll weevil, cotton's worst ecnomic pest, into the 21st century. Lubbock-based Plains Cotton Growers, Inc. (PCG), through its Boll Weevil Steering Committee, is sponsoring the work being conducted by elements of the Texas A&M University (TAMU) System.

The basis for the advanced strategic planning tool now in its first year of development is another computer model, developed over the past three years, that predicts timing and level of boll weevil emergence from overwintering habitat in emergence from overwintering habitat in the spring. The overwintering survival and emergence model combines the re-search work of Dr. Don Rummel, Texas search work of Dr. Don Rummel, Texas Agricultural Experiment Station (TAES) Lubbock, Dr. Jeff Slosser, TAES Vernon, Dr. Tom Fuchs, Texas Agricultural Extension Service (TAEX) San Angelo, and Dr. Nick Stone, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, VA.

Many elements are integrated into the strategic management model. The prototype is built on information from three counties (Dickens, Motley, and Kent) within PCG's boll weevil diapause control zone.

A component of the model is a geo-graphic information sytem (GIS) in which location and acreage of cotton fields together with the results of a comprehensive vegetation survey, land usage, towns, roads, and surface water are also included. Boll weevil infestation data collected over the 28 years of PCG's program operation since 1964 are a unique and valuable resource for the project.

Drs. Rummel, Slosser and Fuchs continue to provide the research data for to attend.

the new project. The programming and model development is coordinated by Dr. Ted Wilson, Professor of Entomology at TAMU, College Station. Wilson is developing a model that simulates boll weevil development and population increase which links to an existing cotton crop system simulation also created by him.

As insect and crop development are linked to the GIS data base, users of the model will be able to forecast overwintering survival, emergence, summer feeding and yield loss for each of many existing and promising management strate-gies. The effectiveness of these alternate management approaches will be evaluated in field trials on the High Plains Boll Weevil Control Program under the leadership of Roger Haldenby, Program Coordinator for PCG.

The model is targeted for completion in 1995 and should increase our ability to in 1993 and should increase our ability to predict major boll weevil outbreaks. Insecticide use in PCG's control zone could be lowered by as much as 40 percent. If adopted and adapted by other areas of Texas, reductions of up to 60 percent could be seen in those areas.

ASCS will be reviewing contracts this year to determine eligibility for loans and loan deficiency payments.
