experienced groceryman says he likes for a husband to buy food when he is hungry. He will frequently buy twice as much as after he had a good meal.

The lot is not easy for preachers when they are requested to say something appropriate at the bier of a departed person whose life may have been less than a symbol for good. One preacher said he was asked to preach the funeral of a well-known gambler and met the situation with the best of his ability. He told the small audience that it had not been his pleasure to know the deceased, but that friends said he was good-hearted and had been an excellent guitar player.

 An expression of appreciation is like powdered sugar sprinkled over the frequently tough and unsavory bread of life. **

Senility must be that station in life when younger people walk away before you have completed a discourse of seasoned advice.

It is unfortunate that the paths of pleasure and ambition are seldom double-lane, and often lead in opposite directions. Perhaps the secret lies in finding satisfying pleasure in the achievement of ambition.
