TRAIL DUST

By DOUGLAS MEADOR
An acquaintance who has been able to avoid alcoholism by waiting until five o'clock before he imbibes, was glad to welcome daylight saving time. It provides an extra hour. His only misgiving is thinking of October, when he will lose the extra sixty minutes.

The stanchions of conduct are often eroded by the weakening rust of small habits. Rust eats away the strength of steel and deteriorates it from its original beauty.

★
Work is the great leveler of disturbed emotions. It is probable that many of the great achievements of all ages resulted when talented men and women found it necessary to bury themselves in work.

★
We used to have trouble with the tongue after backing the buggy in the shed. There was a hole cut in the door from which it protruded, but it was not easy for a boy to back the vehicle to the correct location.

★
The quality of greatness never reaches a more inspiring orbit than in the hour when a successful man pauses to encourage a fellow passenger on this star who can not find his ticket.

★
The condition of my vision became alarming recently when I was to the point of passing a truck ahead. It was not a truck but a black patched place in the white pavement.

★
Dimming your lights when meeting another vehicle is like making a night deposit in the bank of goodwill.

The man's hair was like fine silver and he always smelled of tobacco and horse sweat. He rode in the saddle with the ease of being in a rocking chair and he smiled with the ease that happiness alone can provide. We rode into a small valley one spring and dismounted. The prairie was covered with buttercups. We knelt and he taught me how to pray.
