FROM THE MOUNTAIN

In our opinion Santa Anna has as fine a team as any in our district. You can't judge a team by the wins they make in taineers are tops and after all, credit for keeping their heads despite odds and keeping the game clean than they would if they piled up a big score by methods not so commendable. Let's see if a big crowd can't go over to Ballinger Friday night to yell for the Mountaineers.

We nominate Mr. Roy F. Reid as an additional drum major of the band and pep squad because from the way he was bouncing around to the music at the football game Friday, he really must have what it takes. Of course he probably would say he was jigging to keep warm, but he sure made his shivvers keep time to the

Rodeo Honors Lerov Stockard On 7th Birthday

Honoring Leroy Stockard on his seventh birthday, twelve young cowboys, six cowboys from the Circle Dot Ranch and six from the Lazy H Ranch gathered at the home of Leroy Stockard to enjoy a rodeo last Wednesday, Oct. 13 at 3 o'clock.

Dressed in cowboy regalia, the host and his guests left nothing undone to make the rodeo a big success and their mounts were adorned in appropriate regalia.

Grand entry was made with Jim Tom Simpson on his stick horse, Smoky; Johnnie Conlee riding Rex; Duane Moredock riding Pink; Annie Lou Conlee on Jim; John Hardy Blue on Lax; Will Rogers Berry on Sally Rann; Johnnie Newman on Nigger; James Goodwin riding Dick; Henry Goodwin Jr. riding Paint; James Fulton on Ball; Billie Don Baker riding Star; and LeRoy Stockard riding Trix. The lovely gifts were pre-sented to the bride in a novel way in keeping with her duties as anesthetist at the local hospital. Gifts were wrapped in a sheet and were wheeled into the room where the honoree was asked to give the "patient" anesthetic since the doctor could not be located. On close examination the "patient" proved to be a large number of beautiful and useful gifts.

At the close of the afternoon refreshments of sandwiches, coffee and doughnuts were served to the guests. Plate favors were tiny pumpkins and Hallowe'en cups.

THE STORY

someone opened the door and came in and she roused herself to face Elinor Cayne, her face twisted from its beauty, her fair skin blotched with angry red, her blue eyes sharp with fury. Rachel saw these ravages in an agony of pity.

"Oh, I am sorry," she said. "I know about you now," said Elinor Cayne. "I thought there was something queer about you from the first day. I never trusted you and I never liked you. And now I know you were sent in here just to trap me and ruin my life and Holbrook's. I wasn't going to let you leave without telling you how rotten and vile I think you are!"

"Don't," said Rachel, "don't say such things. I can't bear to hear

She thought Rachel was afraid and she went on to childish threats: "I shouldn't think you could. But you're going to hear this and much worse. I'll make it my only object in life to see that you're paid out for this, I'll do as much to you as you have to me, more if I can."

"You've done that already," said Rachel slowly, "just by letting me know what sort you are. I would have given anything to find you dif-

"What do you mean?" demanded Elinor. "How dare you talk like that!"

Rachel opened her lips to say it. "But you're my mother"-she held the four words waiting, unspoken, running them over in her mind, thinking what they might mean to both of them.

"If I tell her," thought Rachel, "if I tell her . . . how I came here, wanting her, loving her, hoping she would . . . no, I can't do it. I can't. She is not my mother, I was born to her, but that doesn't make her my mother, not really. Anne's my real mother. This woman doesn't want me, she hates me, she'd hate me more if she knew I was her child."

She rose to her feet and looked down at Elinor, putting her away forever, putting her out of her mind. her heret, her poor romantic hopes. "I'm serry you feel this way, Mrs. Cayne. 'she said, 'but you mustn't threaten me. I'm going." She closed the lid of her suitcase and lifted it from the bed. "I am sorxy." she repeated. Again there obscure message of forces and reasons beyond their words, beyond their knowledge. Elinor felt it and went out without any more bluster and Rachel followed her to the door and watched the little exquisite figure disappear out of her life. She knew she must let her go. And she found in herself a complete willingness that it should be so. As Elinor had let her child go, so now her child let Elinor go, rejected her, denied her.

It was difficult to say good-by quickly to Towers and Lena, they hung on to Rachel with questions and cautions and a genuine wish to help her, their friendliness was embarrassing. "If she won't give you the right kind of a reference, I'll speak to Mr. Cayne," said Towers, "and we'll both go to any registry office and tell the lady in charge of it about you, Rachel. A girl just starting out has a bad time if the mistress is spiteful."

"You don't need to do that," Rachel assured them. "I have a job, Mrs. Cayne can't take it away from me. I'll never forget how kind you two have been, never."

At last she was free to go out into the cold early evening. The only thing she wanted was to be alone. She didn't want to go back to Pink and the apartment right away, she couldn't start in at Vinco's in the morning as if nothing had happened. She must be quiet, she must wait until this stunned and bereft feeling had grown less painful. She anust put her world into proper perspective, she must reshape this whole episode in her mind, she was shaken and dazed with its violence. If there was some place she could go—and then she thought, "But of course, the house at Rockboro. Mr Kreel's kept it open, I can camp out there a day or two and get hold of myself, nobody'll talk to me, nobody'll bother me. If there's only

There must be a train, there were always trains to Boston, and if she couldn't find one that stopped at the Junction, she could stay in the city all night and sie but by the sudming. All she'd take a bus, there was sure To be skilled.

There was a thin surface part of herself that went on with this arrangement of practical matters, she even remembered to send a telegram to Pink, telling where she was going, promising to be back in a few days. Beneath these mechanical impulses she began to feel a dreadful weeping and grief which could not be denied forever.
"If I give way and bawl I'll make a frightful show of myself." she thought, "I must wait, I must hold out." But she could never remember any detail of that trip. Like someone wounded in a frightful accident who still continues to sneak to move though covered with blood, she went on with the normal behavior of a belated traveler until she had finished the way, getting off the train, walking fearlessly through the cold dark town-it was after midnight-thinking of the last morning when she had gone down that street with Anne, until she reached the house on the dunes. It was dark. unlighted, the door locked, but Rachel knew there was a kitchen window latch which would not hold. She pushed it up and climbed in. She knew her way up the stairs and then, not into her own room, but Anne's. There sie threw off her hat, pulled the dust cover from the bed and lay down on the bare mattress in all her clothes, with her coat for cover. And then at last she could cry. She did not know when her tears stopped and she fell into a deep, dreamless, healing sleep. Bright chilly sunshine woke her, the room was full of it coming through the shutterless uncurtained windows across the ocean, the reflection from the water giving it a restless white brilliancy, the waves' movement translated into the medium of light. Cold, stiff and crumpled. Rachel sat up blinking, hardly knowing at first where she was. Her principal feeling was one of ravening hunger and there was nothing to eat in the house, she was sure. There wasn't even any water turned on, she couldn't so much as wash her face, and it was very dirty. Slowly she slid to the floor and looked at herself in Anne's mirror over Anne's bare dresser. As she did so she sniffed the air, there was the faint sweet echo of the Spanish jasmine perfume which Anne always used, the room, closed all these weeks, had kept it alive to suggest and bring Anne near. It gave Rachel a touch of comfort and content.

Her face in the mirror, streaked with last night's tears over the dust and grime of her journey, was so comical that Rachel laughed aloud. "I am a sight!" she said. "Simply foul! I've got to clean up before I can go downtown and get my breakfast." She had not remembered to wind her watch, so she didn't know what time it was, but she glanced through the side window at the Kreel house which offered no sign of life so she concluded that it must be very early. No use standing and shivering! She opened her suitcase and found cold cream, scrubbed her face with it, combed her hair, shook her disheveled clothes into better shape and felt infinitely better.

Downstairs it was warmer, there was a tiny banked fire in the living room fireplace and a chair drawn up by the radio indicated cent presence of Mr. Kreel. He had left his pad and pencil on another chair, he must have been there the night before, possibly until just before she came. The sun filled this room, too. Mr. Kreel had kept it clean, though the furniture was still covered with dust sheets and newspapers. And there was the desk where Anne had sat while Rachel had begged to know about her real mother! Rachel walked about the room, remembering.

As she remembered she was conscious that she missed something in herself, she missed the unrest, the foolish feverish purpose that had seized her that very day and driven her into her search for Elinor Cayne and all that had come with it. She knew she had been wise to come here. This house was Anne and Anne was her mother, not the poor vain little creature she had sought.

She couldn't go on thinking about all this, she was much too hungry. Downtown at the drugstore she could at least get coffee, but first, "Well, I am dumb!" she thought, "I can turn on the radio and find the time.' A trickle of music-those thin early morning programs of small hard-working orchestras-and then four warning notes and "Eight o'clock." Eight o'clock! Why, the Kreels ought to be up and about, but she supposed all Rockboro slept late in winter to rest from the vagaries and exactions of summer people. She smiled at that, it was easy to feel amused this morning. As she walked down into the town she thought vaguely of what she ought to do, but she would make no plans further than eating an enormous breakfast. It was wonderful to be like this, free and idle and happy! "Nothing on my mind but my hat," she thought, gaily, giving that battered object a more rakish tilt. Every familiar house was a friend. "I never thought I'd be so glad to see Bockboro all by my-self!" When she came to Bob Eddis' little house she stopped short. abe had left him out of her calculations. She furned and give his door a resounding knock.

Of course, but what on earth-"Listen, Bob, I'm hungry enough to eat raw fish—oh heavens, I smell bacon-and coffee-do give me some-but if you haven't a lot I'll go on to the inn. I mean, I must have a great deal of food, at once. Get the idea?"

She looked about the room-the bed wasn't made but Bob had bathed and shaved and was in the midst of getting breakfast. The cooking cupboard was open, the stove lighted, bacon sizzled and acoffeepot steamed on it. On the table were rolls and butter and an orange. There was a fire on the hearth, too, fresh-made, and the room was deliciously warm.

Bob forked the bacon to one side broke two eggs in the hot fat and covered the pan so they would cook slowly. Then he turned and deliberately began to make his bed. "I usually air the clothes, but I'll dispense with that this morning since I'm entertaining," he said. "Gee, Rachel, it's grand to see you!"

Rachel drank her coffee and stared about the bare white room and at Bob.

"You're fatter," she said, "or should I say you're not so skinny? You look awfully well."

"You're thinner," countered Bob, smoothing the quilted white coverlet over the bed, "or should I say you're skinnier? And you don't look so well. There, that's in order." "And you're just as nasty-neat as ever. For heaven's sake, aren't those eggs done? Got any marmalade?'

Bob brought another plate and fork and cup. "Start on a roll if you're fainting away." He took up the eggs and the bacon and set the plate before her with a flourish. "Dig in, my good woman, and when the first wolfish pangs are appeased maybe you'll tell me why you have been brought to beggary and shame. I hope the story is fit for my refined ears."

'I dunno about that. However, you're the librarian and you keep a shelf marked 'For adults only' and I dare say you've read them all. How's the library doing, by the way?"

"We're pretty much in the public eye just at the moment because a group of our local matrons have just got round to demanding a ban on Anthony Adverse-a movement heartily opposed by the youth of the town. Me, I don't take sides, let 'em fight it out, gives them something to talk about in the long winter evenings. More coffee?" "Lots more!" All very well, she thought, to sit and jape like this, but something was different with Bob. He sounded just the same, he was certainly glad to see her, but there was something lackingand she couldn't define it. Last summer she had not hesitated to tell him of Anne's story of her real mother and it would have been natural enough to tell him the sequel, only she found that she wasn't going to. It was something in him that had changed. And what on earth could it be! For all he had asked her why she had appeared so suddenly and unexpectedly in Rockboro, she wasn't sure that he wanted to hear any outpouring of confidence from her. And it might be a great deal better to keep it to herself, anyway. She dumped more sugar in her coffee and began to

"I'm sorry there isn't snow on the ground I wanted to see snow against the sea.'

"There's been plenty snow, around New Year's there were drifts so high I couldn't open my front door. We may have more too.'

"I came down," improvised Rachel, cautiously, "to get something out of the house we forgot to take, or rather Anne forgot. Some papers. I daresay it's just as well there isn't any snow. I got in on the late train and went out to the house and slept there last night and it wouldn't have been any fun walking through drifts that distance."

'Why on earth didn't you let me find the papers for you? Or wire me to meet you? I could have come down to the Junction."

"One lie always leads to another." thought Rachel. Then aloud: "I meant to wire you but I only had a minute to catch the train and I couldn't ask you to send me the things because I don't know where they are. I've got to hunt for them. They have," she concluded brightly, "something to do with insurance. Anne's trustee wants them right away." To her great relief he accepted this tale with no further questions. "It was a fool thing to do, land here after midnight and go walking up that lonely road. I know damn' well there weren't any taxis at the station. But you specialize in fool things, Rachel. You like to do them. It's a form of exhibitionism." "How right you are! How about that marmalade, Mr. Freud?" "Honestly, I never saw anybody eat such a lot. Disgusting!" "It's swell. You've been digging into that marmalade yourself, you've left very little for me." "There's plenty for you. Why are you looking at me that way?" Rachel giggled. "I was doing a little Freudian stuff myself. You've changed somehow, Bob. It isn't just the fat. What is it? What've you been up to? To her astonishment he was em-

"Hello," she said, as the door opened, "could you give a pow but worthy girl a bite to est?"

"Rachell What are you doing here?" He drew her in and held her hands in amazement and delignt.

"Asking for my breakfest design" has you get the said, and there was an undertone of real irritation.

"An me," she sighed, "I suppose live not done, eat up a gent's markeds and was into his double life, defined which would have been said at me

"Which reminds me that you did no friendly act when you loosed Mr. Kreel on me. I've eaten 29 different kinds of cereal and been deluged with samples of shaving stuff, soap, perfume, cold cream, and laxatives, all because of Mr. Kreel's passion for the radio. And now the poor old geezer thinks he's going to win an automobile."

"Maybe he'll give you that, too." "I think his idea is to escape from the missis and Sister Susie in it and go to California."

"I hope he succeeds. I'm going over to Mrs. Duffy's, Bob. Thousands of thanks for a delicious breakfast. I'll be seeing you when I'm clean again."

Scribblers are Initiated

Considerable amount of aughter and enthusiasm was displayed amoung the group of Scribblers who assembled in the home of Miss Mattie Ella Mc-Creary Monday night for the initiation of new members.

The members to be initiated were requested to wear short candy and the boys furnished rived they were given an allthe nuts. A total profit of day sucker and a stick of blowgum. As they came without make-up, the old members couldn't stand their looking so pale so they painted each face with a large amount of lip-stick. Several tricks were played on them and afterwards each member took part in an amateur program. Alice Jane Lovelady won the amateur contest; she thought all of the time she was the cutest.
