RELIEF AND EMPLOYMENT

What we need is not a cut in appropriations for relief but an analysis of why the relief rolls remain so enormous at all points of the business cycle.

I suspect that our continued huge unemployment is not an act of God but the result of policies. If it is the result of policies, then by all means let us reconsider them.

The WPA is an attempt to create jobs for workers at subsistence wages. A real national employment policy would concentrate on creating an economic situation in which jobs for workers at normal wages would naturally occur.

This is, no doubt, partly due to the relative stability, at long last, of our population.

It is also due, as Mr. Lippmann pointed out the other day, to the effort to stabilize all prices at a high level, whether they be prices of farm and industrial products or prices of labor.

Above and beyond that, we have adopted anti-employment policies. And we shall never radically reduce the relief rolls until we abandon these policies and remove the obstacles to the functioning of the economic process.

One such anti-employment policy is government competition with private industry.

From the viewpoint of obtaining the largest possible use of capital and labor a case can be made for socialism, and a case can be made for private industry.

In our economy there is 10 to 20 times as much private capital invested in the utilities as there is governmental capital, and government competition therefore prevents far more re-employment than it can possibly substitute.

By subsidies and gifts for duplication of existing facilities by municipalities and other agencies, it prevents the release and expansion of existing utilities.

Nor is the answer for the government to buy out part of the utilities—whether at a high price or at a low price. The latter question is not of the essence of the matter.

If the government wants to prevent a conglomeration of the blood of the utility industry it must either buy them all out or buy out none, and stop competing.

For if it buys out some of them, all the others will be affected.

As far as technological unemployment is concerned, numerous government policies add to it.

For instance, it has been proved that the development of electric power by water uses far less man power than the development of electric power by steam. Ninety per cent of the cost of hydroelectric power is capital charges and amortization. Capital charges for steam power are hardly more than 34 per cent.

Our taxation policies also ought to be reconsidered for their effect on employment.

I have always been convinced that the financing of unemployment insurance and old-age pensions out of payroll taxes, instead of out of general taxation, definitely contributes to technological unemployment.

It puts a premium on the use of machines.

Some labor saving devices actually mean a greater use of labor—over the whole economy—others mean less.

But a policy bent on increasing employment would not tax pay-rolls.

It would do the exact opposite. It would grant tax reductions for increased pay rolls. It would use the tax power to create employment incentives.

The liberalization of our taxation structure would also give incentives to capital employment.

Actually, both government budgets and corporation taxes ought to be planned over a business cycle.

British corporations are allowed to average their taxes over a certain number of years—six, I believe. They can therefore afford to spend money even on the down-grade of the cycle, because they get credit on the up-grade. Our industries, because of the tax system, cannot do this.

Britain actually has a higher rate of corporation tax, but because the industries can average it they really pay this rate, whereas in this country, over a period of several years in which years of loss predominate, it is possible that with a rate of 15 per cent, an industry may actually pay in taxes 50 per cent of its averaged earnings.

We also need a radical reconsideration of trade union policies and
