and wrote into the small hours of morning. Whitmonday was a day of festival for the children of Horbury. And it was custom for them to march, with crosses and banners, to a neighboring town to join other children for the annual celebration. For the event in 1854 the Rev. Baring-Gould was asked to escort the group. On the night before he searched hymnals for a song the children might sing as they marched. Giving up his search, he wrote some verses of his own; wrote them "Hymn for Procession with Cross and Banners" and went to bed. That same year the young bachelor saved a mill hand's daughter from drowning, sent her away to school, married her in 1868 , . . and kept on writing. At the death of his father, in 1881, he inherited a fortune, moved into a manmill town of Horbury, England. On Sundays he sion at Lew Trenchard . . . and kept on writing. For 52 years Baring-Gould wrote a novel a year.

He also wrote books on religion, mythology, biography, travel, folk-lore, theology . . . and published a book of hymns. His "Lives of the Saints" alone covers 15 volumes. Yet, he wrote all his 85 books in long hand and never had a secretary. "I never wait for an inspiration," he said, "and when I begin a job I stay on it 'til it's finished."

Had the Rev. Baring-Gould lived 26 days more he would have been 90 when he died in 1924. It is said the literary catalogue of the British Museum lists more titles by him than any other author of his time. But Sabine Baring-Gould is best remembered for a children's marching song he wrote one night when he was 30 . . . and to which a 29-year-old organist named Arthur Sullivan set to music in 1871. . . .
