"Utterly disregarding editorial warnings sounded in scores of news papers from coast to coast that the public business of the national government must be openly conducted with the people being kept fully informed of governmental activities through the press, President Hoover and a determined group of bureaucrats have literally thrown down the gauntlet to the Washington correspondents on the question of cenorship," George H. Manning, Washington correspondent of Editor &

He continues thus: "True, verbal denials persist, from the White down, that there is any thought of censorship. It is stated and reiterated that the newspaper-men are free to write what they will but these declarations are ac companied by 'suggestions' that is might be more discreet and consor with public interest to write what is handed out officially.

The crowning announcement o this nature came last week from the president himself at the regular Tuesday press conference. The one uppermost in the minds of the 100 correspondents was the bi partisan conference of the congres-aional leaders and others, which had

The president opened the confer ence by amazing the writers with the statement that he would have nothing to announce regarding the conference set for that evening and that he would not announce the names of those who were expected to attend, and could not state the program to be considered. He suggested that correspondents refrain from "waylaying" the high public to the White House for that night's Scrivenor into the conference." If the corres pondents would "bear with me" until the following day, the president explained, he would issue a matement giving full information as to the previous night's session.

"With his intelligence and native shrewdness Columbus quickly adaped himself to the elegant courtly milieu, in which he found himself...

"The humble Ffigrim's robe in which he arrived at Palos was soon replaced by a costume of perfect cut and made by the Duke's tailor and at the Duke's expense."

Columbus knew the value of quality in fine apparel, for he spent his early life as a weaver.

And before he became an explorer, he was a woolen mer-

Perhaps America would have have been found without the assistance of fine apparel, but the discovery would undoubtedly have come many years later.

... and civilization would have been retarded just that much.

Christopher Columbus was not our customer, but every day men shop in this store who are suc-ceeding and discovering new fields of success.
