good level and fertile land would be better than the land they knew from which they came.

Coming from a cotton country infested with Johnson Grass, cockleburrs, and boll weevils, they had hopes of a better way of raising their families.

They soon found that it took half of their land to feed the work stock and cattle. The maize grew abundantly, and a lot of work to harvest and sell it at an overproductive price. And sure enough, they soon got back in the cotton business—that dreaded back breaking job they were seeking relief from.

Horse-drawn implements were all they had, and this new land sure could grow lots of weeds.

Four or five times of cultivating were necessary. The small farmers had to grow enough feed for the livestock and poultry.

This did not leave enough cotton to feed the family and make the land payments and taxes, unless the family did the chopping and picking.

About this time the depression hit the national economy, and everybody, rich and poor, had to live through it. No one could make a living. They just lived on what they made: milk, butter, cream and eggs, together with a good garden and a few meat hogs. They came through the situation better than the average.

About that time the tractors took the horse and mule deal over, and people planted cotton in abundance, turn row to turn row. Transient workers, black, brown, and all colors, came to the plans to chop cotton, and then came back in the fall for picking time.

Farmers soon began to build new homes and the homestead shack were used to house the pickers.

Soon Lamb County was on the map as one of the leading cotton counties in the state.

BULA NEWS

By MRS. JOHN BLACKMAN

A LARGE GROUP of friends and neighbors of the Bula-Enochs communities gathered at the community center Saturday night and enjoyed barbecue, salads and sweets, followed by group singing of folk songs, led by James Sinclair, with Mrs. Sinclair at the piano. Games of "42" were played by some, while others just visited. Later, homemade ice cream was served. Mrs. Sinclair accompanied by J. D. Rowland on the guitar played and sang several songs, that were enjoyed. Saturday night, July 31, Thousands and thousands of transients filled the streets every Saturday. Business houses and filling stations grew bigger and better.

Even the little country stores made plenty of money. Picking sacks, knee pads, and canvas gloves—they could sell all they could get. And then on Saturday, they bought groceries for the coming week.

All stores, both dry goods and grocery, looked forward to picking time. The banks had to keep plenty of cash on hand for the Saturday rush. Movies did an overflow business, and everybody was happy "come picking time".

This mad, but important time, soon had its ending. herbicides and more modern equipment took over the chopping, and that part of the deal was over.

Soon, cotton pickers—machines that could gather cotton of one tenth of the cost of hand gatherers—took over the harvest, and with the modern gins and transportation, hand "picking time" has gone forever.

Gigantic XIT spread shapes Texas history

The fabulous land swap by which the capitol of Texas was built spawned most of Lamb County.

But a lot of rich history moved across the wide South Plains between the king-size land trade—of 3-million acres—that started in 1882, and the founding of a new town 31 years later, in 1913.

The land deal created the legendary XIT ranch, a vast land holding that stretched more than 200 miles, from the upper boundary of the Texas Panhandle, clear down into Hockley County, taking in parts, or all, of Lamb and nine other counties.

Price of the land was the building of the Texas state capital in Austin, a building as majestic today as when it was dedicated 75 years ago. The capitol transaction is a unique page of Texas history, and of some controversy still.

This was a trade in what was to become the Texas tradition, gradiose, full of gamble, based in large part of faith and not entirely exacting. Like many Texas Trades, time made it good for both parties.

The men who planned and founded a new city, named for one of them, were Major George Littlefield, and Arthur P. Duggan Sr.

The history of the city will wind inexorably around and about these two men, while enfolding hundreds of others who made measureable contributions, men and women who devoted uncounted days and years to establishing on the table-top South Plains a community of people, and homes for those people.

But back to the XIT, that sprawling land area whose account must be a part of any High Plains history, a story whose facts need no embellishment.

As Texas entered the 1880's still itself less than 50 years old, the need of a state house befitting the stalwart new giant of the southwest dominated thinking in Austin, the capitol city.

On coming into the United States, Texas kept its public lands, domains of millions of acres, largely in West Texas. To this day, these lands and their minerals are a financial bulwark to the state's schools and colleges. In 1880, Texas was a state of many acres renegade outlaws sometimes took refuge there.

A contingent of Texas Rangers accompanied the surveying party, a practical safety measure.

Finish of the survey job was well several years.

Norton's survey jagged down through the 10 counties, picking up arable lands and skipping less choice areas. It excluded a rectangular area in Lamb and Bailey counties made up of north end was let to an old buffalo hunter, Bill Metcalf, who started in 1885 and by year's end had 162 miles of barbed wirestrung. Other contracts were let on the south end and by the fall of 1886, 731 miles of fence had been strung, a job of soul-trying work in an area where all supplies had to be hauled by wagon from rail points as much as 100 miles away.

On its northwest side, the fence ran 150 miles without a turn. Through its center there were numerous jogs, put there by Norton in his land selection. The fence length was increased in the late 1890's, when cross fences cut the giant XIT into 94 pastures.

One of these was the Yellowhouse, a headquarters on the extreme south edge of Lamb County, which for years served as an entry point for the large cattle herds the ranch brought from South Texas.

Cattle started arriving at the Yellowhouse, the southern-most headquarters for the ranch, in the summer of 1885. Whole herds of Texas longhorns were bought down in the Fort Concho country, and delivered by trail drivers.

At times the dust of a half dozen herds colored the skies below Yellowhouse, a horizon of many miles.

One of the trail drivers brought the ranch its name. He was Ab Blocker, one of the ablest and best known of Texas cattle trail drivers, who operated with his brother, John, in Tom Greer County.

Blocker, no doubt recognizing that cattle of the big ranch would be fair game for rustlers, proposed the "XIT" as a brand hard to block out or convert to another brand by cow thieves.

Water a problem

With the arrival of cattle, the Yellowhouse ranch experienced a severe shortage of water. This was largely solved by the digging of wells, 20 to 30 feet deep, and pumped by an elevator arrangement of a series of water boxes drawn through the well by horses trotting a circle.

One of these could furnish enough water daily for a thousand cattle, but the arrival of cattle kept the water problem acute through late 1885, as herds were branded and dumped on BUFFALOES RANGED lower Lamb County on the Yellowhouse Ranch in the early 1900's. The animals were for the most part gentle, but had a terrible homing instinct. timed. Late in 1881 the old capitol building in Austin burned, making imperative the building of a new one.

Bids were called January 1, 1882, for the building, according to an architect's plan drawn by E. E. Myers of Detroit. Texas architects then were in short supply.

Only two people bid, the successful one an Illinois man who promptly sold 75 percent of his contract to a Chicago financial group made up of Abner Taylor, A. C. Babcock, John V. Farwell and Charles B. Farwell. Taylor became trustee for the group, which bought the remaining 25 percent of the capitol contract in a few months.

The price for building the capitol: 3,000,000 acres of land.

Taller than D.C.

Work started that year on the red Texas granite structure, whose design spoke up for the new giant of the southwest. Its dome was to tower 311 feet from the base, taller than the Capitol at Washington, and it was a handsome building, then as now.

The estimated cost of construction of the building was $1,500,000. Its final figure was $3,744,370, of which the Syndicate paid $3,224,593, their price for the 3-million acres.

This amounted to $1.07 an acre for the XIT land. Critics since have attacked this figure, ridiculous at today's prices. But then the same land nearby was being bought by Charles Goodnight for 25 cents an acre, and an offer of the 50,000 acres to finance the Capitol Lands survey brought a high bid of 55 cents an acre.

The Capitol Syndicate traded on the facts of Commissioner Norton's survey. Later, they had an inspection survey made, following Norton's maps, and discovering one discrepancy which threw the question of the Texas-New Mexico border into argument. It finally took President Taft and Congress to settle this, in Texas' favor, in 1911.

After the trade to build the Texas state capitol had been made—for 3 million West Texas acres—with the Capitol Syndicate of Chicago, the syndicate's financiers took a second look at what they had bought. They started with an inspection and survey of the land maps of the survey on which the trade was made, a job done by N. L. Norton, a Texas official appointed for the land selection. This was in 1882.

Generally, Norton's figures were verified satisfactorily, although the correction of some errors was to take of sand hills.

From the beginning, the Capitol Syndicate looked on their lands as the site of thousands of farms one day. But the 1880's were too early for mass colonization, and the XIT ranch was planned to close the gap. It was a gap of more than 30 years.

The farm idea came natural to the two major financial figures in the Syndicate, the Farwells. In their sixties when they entered the Texas project, the Farwells were wealthy merchants in Chicago. But they had grown up on a 160-acre farm that their family settled, moving there from New York after immigrating from England.

The High Plains held the same promise of the rich Illinois acres. Years later, this promise was to be fulfilled far beyond the visions of the Farwells.

It was apparent that the cost of building the Texas capitol was just the beginning of investment for the Capitol Syndicate. There were hundreds of miles of fences to build, thousands of head of cattle to buy, wells to dig and operating headquarters to be built.

IT'S GRUB TIME for these ranch hands on the old Yellowhouse Ranch. The men are taking a break from counting cattle, branding them and rounding them up. The food and bedding was carried on the chuck wagon ready for the men when they came in.

For new capital, John V. Farwell went to Europe where the Farwell company had strong business connections. Money was available in England, but to borrow it required the organization of an English company.

So the Capitol freehold Land and Investment Company was formed. It received the Texas acres in trust, in exchange for operating capitol to develop the ranch project, not then named XIT.

These transactions gave birth to the idea that the XIT was an English development, which it was not. John V. Farwell was managing director of the giant undertaking, and it remained a United States operation, underwritten by English capital.

Foreign money

This was a time when money from England and Scotland was flowing into Texas ranch developments. The early 1880's saw tremendous profits in the Texas cattle business, and world investors clamored for entry. The late 1800's, when depression struck the industry, cooled their ardor but the picture of tweedy Scotsmen and English men surveying their strange western holdings, was not too uncommon in the southwest as the century turned.

The fencing of the XIT was an epic in itself. A fencing contract for the up to the Springlake ranch.

Windmills were installed and soon dotted the entire ranch, solving the water need.

These steel towers, topped by whirling metal fans, were forerunners of powerful combustion engine pumps that one day would transfer much of the Yellowhouse and Springlake domains into productive acres, their nutritious native grasses exchanged for regular fields of cotton and grain sorghum.

This was the vision of the Farwells, when they staked their fortune on the giant XIT.

A land of many farms, carefully tilled and populated by many people. The change came gradually, from the gaunt Longhorns; from horse wagons to railroads. Even as hardriding cowboys ranged the sprawling acres, as fence riders traded shots with maverick rustlers, as legends grew, the destiny of the Plains was in the making.

For the Yellowhouse acres, the agents of its destiny were Major George Littlefield, a ranking Texan who never lived in the city named for him, and Arthur P. Duggan Sr., who gave to its development the full energies of his life.

XIT

THIS COOKOUT ON THE OLD Yellowhouse Ranch shows two cowboys getting the meat ready. The boy in the foreground is George White, former owner-operator of the ranch.

The giant XIT was both the origin of Littlefield and the material from which it and dozens of other Texas cities were carved, from here to Dalhart. It was also a force of history whose markings will last as long as there is Texas, and whose legends will continue to grow.

This, then, was the geographical background for Littlefield and its neighbors of the South Plains who today are centers of Texas' most fertile agricultural lands, pouring forth bounties of cotton, grain and other produce of the soil.

There was a background of sounds, too: of the steady drumming of cattle hooves, moving up from the south, of the shouts of sweating cowboys, the epithets of drillers of water wells, of wagon haulers and fence builders.

And finally the quaint whistle of the railroad locomotive, rifting the quiet air of the plains with the herald of the opening of new lands.

The railroad, then the Panhandle and Santa Fe, was the midwife at the birth of Lamb Co. The rails were the life stream of the western United States bedding verdant new soil from which would spring up many new towns, towns with all the unbounded ambition of the west and dreams of becoming another Fort Worth or Chicago of Kansas City.

Most of them burst from the thin seedings of land agents and were destined to bloom briefly, then to wither or to scratch forever for the substance of life, with little growth.

Some were planted with care, and as carefully nurtured in their budding years. These grew and became sturdy points of commerce.

Littlefield was one of these, at founding the West Texas terminus of the Santa Fe railroad. Started when the railroad began laying tracks to its new point, Littlefield was a raw settlement of perhaps a half dozen temporary wooden buildings when the first rain whistled triumphantly into "town" early in 1914.

From these a city was formed—the XIT, the Santa Fe, and the fertile soil.

But life could come only from men. Circumstances brought to the Lamb County area two men who thought as builders, lasting builders who spiked firmly their rafters today while their thoughts raced ahead over a horizon of years.

but few dollars.

Statesmen in Austin formed the idea of trading some of this land for a capitol building, which the state could not well finance any other way, and which was sorely needed as settlers pushed its growth steadily.

Amendment approved

A proposal to trade 3,000,000 acres for a capitol was put into a constitutional amendment and approved by the people of Texas in 1876. This provision empowered the legislature to act, and they did in 1879, appropriating 3,050,000 acres for the building and a survey of the land to be traded.

The land was to come from the Capitol Reservation in the counties of Lamb, Bailey, Cochran, Hockley, Dallam, Hartley, Oldham, Deaf Smith, Parmer and Castro.

N. L. Norton of Salado was appointed as commissioner for the land selection. He accompanied a surveying party that took about a year to complete its sizeable job, which was reported to the capitol board in January, 1881.

There were few inhabitants of the plains area in the early 1880's. Bands of Indians wandered across it and
