SCS Drought

Experience has also proven that regulating livestock numbers to control grazing use on grasses will conserve the grass resource which is the foundation for the ranching industry.

Operations can be kept flexible by carrying 60 to 70 per cent of a base herd of breeding animals such as mother cows that can be safely grazed on the ranch and still use no more than 50 per cent of the annual growth of the grasses. The remaining livestock are made up of readily salable livestock such as stockers, steers or lambs. These can be disposed of at the beginning of a drought or the rancher can choose not to run them through the winter if forage production has been below normal. A rancher who has a stocker, steer or lamb operation has the most flexibility because he can elect to sell early or not buy at all.

Others gain flexibility by always keeping a reserve of livestock feed. This can be in the form of stored hay or silage or excess grass on the rangeland. Some plant cropland to hybrid sudans or perennial grasses such as, coastal bermuda, switchgrass, blue panic or weeping lovegrass for summer grazing. This will allow ranges to rest during the summer and increase the forage reserve. Excess grass on the rangeland can be deferred pastures or ranges stocked for less than average forage production or rainfall. This will enable the rancher to go through a 3 to 6 month drought without having to sell livestock when there is a "run" on the market and prices are depressed. Then he can sell his livestock at
