was grinding. And that's all.

Judge Andrews goes all the way in his argument for the repeal of drastic laws for minor offenses. This is his argument for a change in criminal procedure: "England at one time had about 20 capital offenses and with such judges as "Bloody" Jeffries the trials were largely judicial murders and the weak, those not members of the high church of England, were so persecuted that they felt as if their government was what Sherman said of war, while many of those who had a pull with the government committed grave crimes with impunity. Every time that any government has enacted drastic laws against the individual rights of its citizens or made penalties all out of proportion to the offenses, great suffering and persecution among the weak and ignorant and bribery and corruption among the high-ups followed."

- Judge Andrews specifically charges, speaking of suspended sentences, that many persons charged with crime have taken their sentences seriously "and have since made good, while others laugh at such sentences like the boy in the blueback speller laughed at the man who threw turf at him in the apple tree and the prison records show that many of them have since become confirmed criminals.

CHAPTER VII THE swamp was a place of low growing trees from which hung Florida moss-the grav, chostly growth that brings the eeriness of a moonless, wind haunted night in to the brightest of noons Some times there were fugitives there and always there were snakes.

Noves shivered, pushing in among the trees with a blunf prowed. canoe. He feared the place but to night a stronger fear made it a sanctuary.

No one could track him here He knew the swamp as few knew it and a canoe left no scent for dogs Perhaps even now at Bantum's they were watching for him. He remem bered, with a cold clutch at his heart, having snubbed Jeffries for telling, at a club they both frequented, a not too pleasant story of a woman they both knew. He wondered whether Jeffries remembered.

"Even if he does I don't regret it." Noyes said to timself.
