One day, skating breaks through the ice and is rescued by Steve. Steve's mother, whose father built the mill, Brian has been away after two years in the army, ready to take his place in the mill.

Wally Thatcher, daughter of Robert Thatcher, general manager of the mill, schemes to captivate Gale. She sees him with Gale and tries to seduce her.

Wally tells her that she is engaged to Brian and that she is a silk mill. She is deeply hurt. She goes to a dance with Steve. He has been drinking and is shouting and making a scene. She sees what has happened.

CHAPTER XXXVI

Gale, halting in the doorway, looked at the man who had spoken to her. "Just let 'em try! What I care for Thatcher and his yellow-livered spies."

for his rights. He'd show the whole bunch of them!

Gale put a hand on his arm. "Please, Phil," she said. "I want to go home now. You'll take me, won't you?"

Her brother frowned. "Can't tell me what to do," he grumbled. "Nobody can."

"No, Phil, of course not. But you'll come with me, won't you?"

"Well—"

Steve said, "I'll get your coat, Gale. Be with you in a minute."

Before he knew quite what had happened the two of them were hustling Phil through the doorway, out into the night air.

Morning sunshine fell on the pile of letters on Robert Thatcher's desk. It fell on a silver ash tray, too, turning it into blinding brilliance. The glitter annoyed Thatcher and he pushed it to one side. He went on reading the letter before him and did not look up, though he heard the door of the office open. After a moment, he raised his head. His secretary was standing just inside the room, waiting hesitantly.

"Well? There was no reason why Thatcher should be annoyed, but his voice sounded grating, harsh.

The sallow-faced secretary moved a step forward. "The gatekeeper is outside," she said. "Ed Vogel. He says he has a report to make."

Thatcher's eyes narrowed. He said, without waiting, "Tell him to come in."

"Yes, Mr. Thatcher." The secretary disappeared discreetly.

A moment later there was a knock at the door. Thatcher called out, "Come in!"

Ed Vogel entered, hat in hand. He wore a short, dark coat with a knitted band drawing it in at the waist. His tow-colored hair hung in oily wisps at either side of his forehead and his gray eyes were fawning, servile.

"Yes, Mr. Thatcher," he said, stepping across the threshold briskly. "Thank you, Mr. Thatcher."

"What's on your mind?"

Vogel came forward. He said, speaking cautiously, "There's something I thought you'd like to know. Something that happened last night at the dance at Parkers'."

I thought you'd want to hear about it—"

He went on, his voice rising and falling as he talked. Thatcher listened, a cunning light in his eyes. Now and then he asked questions, nodded.

The telephone rang and Thatcher picked it up. "They'll have to wait," he said impatiently and put the telephone down again. Turning to Ed Vogel, he said, "Just a minute. I want to write that name down."

"Here it is, Mr. Thatcher. I wrote it for you." Vogel laid a scrawled memorandum on the desk. For five minutes more he remained in the general manager's office. Then he emerged, closing the door behind him. In the corridor he met a girl wearing an orange and brown skirt. She was a pretty girl and she was carrying a bundle of letters.

Vogel said, "Hi, sweetheart. How about a date tonight?"

The girl looked at him disdainfully. "Think I'd go out with you? You certainly hate yourself, don't you?"

Vogel smirked and went on his way, whistling.

Mrs. O'Connor let the gray shawl fall back from around her shoulders. "I can't stay but a minute," she said. "There's no telling what those young'uns of mine'll be up to when they're alone. You're sure you're not robbin' yourself?"

Gale, cutting a slice of butter substitute and placing it on a saucer, said, "Oh, no. We have plenty."

Mrs. O'Connor settled herself more comfortably. "It certainly is a blessing to have neighbors. Someone you can borrow from when you run short. Tim has his breakfast so early—before the store opens. He'd have had to eat dry bread tomorrow, I guess, if it wasn't for you."

"I've borrowed from you so many times," Gale told her, "I'm glad of the chance to pay you back."

The older woman's hands went up, palms forward. "As though you didn't always pay everything back—and more than that! Any time you want anything we've got in the house just you say so!" Mrs. O'Connor nodded her head sideways as though that settled the matter.

She went on a moment later. "Did you go to the dance last night?"

"Yes."

"How was it?"

"Everyone had a good time, I think." Gale told her, busy before the kitchen cupboard. "I didn't stay very long."

"Steve take you?"

Gale said, "Yes."

Mrs. O'Connor looked as though she might be about to ask further questions, but evidently changed her mind. "I used to be a great one for dancing," she said. "Never missed one if I could help it. Folks used to say Tim and me was the best dancers in the county. We took a prize at the fair once." Mrs. O'Connor sighed reminiscently. "Well," she went on, "that was a long time ago, but I still like to see the young folks enjoy themselves. Get out and have a good time, I always tell them. You're only young once."

"Yes," Gale agreed. "I suppose that's true."

"Of course it is," Mrs. O'Connor said heartily, getting to her feet. She picked up the saucer

Diabetes Shows Steady Increase Over the Nation

AUSTIN—The general increase in diabetes throughout the United States during the past few years is eloquently reflected in the Texas figures. In 1929 only 367 persons were recorded as having died of this malady, while last year about 700 succumbed. Even making allowances for undiagnosed cases in earlier days, the increasing deadly power of this malady thus becomes apparent. And while perhaps it is the least publicized of the major killers, it nevertheless deserves an appreciation of some of the predisposing causes as well as of the methods to combat them," states Dr. John W. Brown, state health officer.

It can be said that, whatever the exciting cause of its development may be, diabetes is definitely associated with the soft living now so general among the so-called white-collar workers. And it is here that diabetes potently and increasingly flourishes.

Thus it is noted that professional men and women, educators, bankers, business executives, servers of food and drink, laboratory and desk and bench people in general—in short, the sedentary workers, are more likely to become victims of this disease than are those who labor manually. And to this list must be added the housewife to whom electricity and leisure in this connection have in numerous instances proved to be doubtful

"There's no hurry—no hurry at all."

"Maybe not, but just the same I'll send it back. Well—I only hope those kids haven't torn the house down!" Mrs. O'Connor put a hand on the door, opening it.

"Good night, Mrs. O'Connor. Can you see your way?"

"Oh, sure—" The older woman clumped down the narrow steps. "Good night, darlin'," she called and then disappeared.

Gale went back to her work, folding freshly ironed garments and placing them in piles. She was putting a stock of dish cloths into a drawer when the outer door opened again. Gale looked up and saw Phil on the threshold. He crossed the door behind him, closed the room. "You'll have to know it," he said, "so I might as well tell you now. I've been fired. And that isn't all—"
