Common Sense Takes Place of An Ideal

Perhaps the most significant single comment on the new tax bill came from Senator Pat Harrison of Missisrippi.

Senator Harrison led the fight in the Senate committee for the administration's tax schedules. When the committee moved out from under him and began to broaden the scope of the bill so as to bring in more money than the administration had contemplated, Senator Harrison strug-A gled for a while and then voted for the insurgents' plan.

As he did so, he dropped the remark that "We might as well go out and get some revenue."

Here, at last, seems to be a saving drop of common sense in the peculiar mixture of high hopes and idealistic plans which has surrounded this tax bill from the beginning. *

"We might as well go out and get some revenue." Yes, indeed-and why not? What else would a new tax bill be for, in a time when the government's expenditures have been exceeding its income for some four years in a row?

We were told originally that this tax bill was to introduce a new principle into American taxation. It was to attack the vast concentrations of wealth, with the idea that they would be scientifically reduced and shaved down so that the world would once more be made safe for the little fellows.

This was all very fine, and it was rather hard to quarrel with it; but when the administration's program was presented to Congress it appeared that the government's very*pressing need for more money to finance its extraordinary series of expenditures had been lost in the shuffle. * *

There is room for more science in our taxation policies, heaven knows. Taxation represents the most effective weapon by which a government can shape the economic destinies of its country; yet for a great many years our tax policy has been more or less a hit-or-miss proposition, and if the administration can so revise it as to make it accomplish desired social ends the country will be all the better for it.

But there is, after all, the question of paying today's bills. The Senate Finance committee's revision of the administration bill is expected to bring an extra half billion in revenue, and the treasury needs that money very badly. * " Senator Harrison, : emarking that we might as wel out and get some revenue, has tapped the nail right of
