Bootlegging Not Wholly Destroyed

True enough, the worst phase of bootlegging, when rival gangs fought it out in the streets of our big cities, and bribery and collusion were taken as a matter of course. seems to have passed with repeal.

But the bootleger is still with us. Last year the enforcement division of the Alcohol Tax Unit of the U.S. Treasury seized 16,142 stills, with a mash capacity of 2,-709,749 gallons. In connection with those raids 12,365,224 gallons of mash were seized and destroyed.

During 1937 there were also 29,477 people arrested for federal liquor law violation, and in 695 major liquor conspiracy cases investigated, 2104 defendants were convicted in court.

That indicates a very considerable amount of bootlegging even in the face of legal liquor, and proves all over again the only thing that is certain about the liquor problem: it is never completely solved.

In the days back before the World War, the drys were certain that national prohibition would solve the problem once and for all. And after 10 years of that, even a great many ardent drys were convinced that the final answer had not been found.

In 1933, wets were jubilant, and gave assurance that under proper legal restriction all would be well, and the problem would be settled forever. Now, already, only five Rubber Making in years later, we face a reviving prohibition movement on a national basis, together with a gradual legal drying up of local areas.

Certainly we ought to have learned by now that no single law, no single plan is going to solve forever a human problem that has been with us at least since the days of Noah.

Constant and temperate application of all we can learn by experience, the broadest education of the individual, gradual yet persistent efforts to temper and control the worst phases of the problem as they arise-these offer a better hope for the future than any dogmatic "one-shot" solution offered by extremists of either persuasion.
