The Supreme Court Takes the Ball

For a moment it looked as if the Supreme Court's decision to give a little study to intercollegiate football would have the effect, once an opinion had been delivered, or crossing the subject off the list of handy issues for dinnertable argumentation.

Most people have already made up their minds, of course, on whether college football is a commercial activity, but a number still can be found on what might be called the other side, and it looked at first glance as if a court decision might bury the subject for good.

A second look, though, changed the picture completely. The issue is not whether intercollegiate football is a "gigantic commercial activity" or a necessity of higher education, but whether it is the former or "an essential governmental function."

This just presents everybody with an entirely new subject to fight about between now and the court's arrival at a decision, and leaves the old issue to go right on being Miss Ethel Foster of Sterling City, president of the Texas Federation cause for hair-pulling.

tional fare than the old. The government is appealing a circuit courts decision favoring the "essential governmental" theory because that decision took away the federal right to impose a tax on the football gate receipts.

The circuit court felt the tax was an unconstitutional burden on the state government, because, in short, state universities also play football.

State universities play football with other states' universities. If football is an essential government function, why couldn't inter-state football be regarded as a function J. of the federal government?

T. Brown. a "gigantic commercial activity," keep your ears open for the old indignant yell: "Take the government out of busi- ter. ness! Rah! Rah! Rah."

Of course, the big danger is that the whole thing will become just another political football.

A rooster in Ironton, O., got killed when he rushed at a washing machine and engaged it in battle. He probably expected it to swerve and honk its horn.
