The Army and Navy

Need Fighters—Not Scholars

When President Roosevelt told the graduating class at the United States Naval Academy the other day that they must get away from the narrow professionalism and strive for "a well-rounded knowledge" of all aspects of modern life, he touched on a point that has been sharply debated of late.

That point concerns the sort of education that our military and naval academies are giving their young men.

West Point and Annapolis exists to train officers for the army and navy. But they have a dual function. They also are supposed to impart the equivalent of the liberal arts education which a young man would get at a first-rate college. And a large number of critics lately have complained that neither institution is doing so very well with the second half of its job.

To a certain extent, this criticism is undoubtedly well taken. In the very nature of things the service schools cannot be expected to do as well as the civilian colleges in the matter of instilling a thirst for pure learning, a grounding in the classics and a passion for abstract research. There just naturally are too many other things for them to do.

But it might be wise for us to ask, seriously, whether this shortcoming makes any very great difference—even if it is as great a shortcoming as some of the critics say.

The army and the navy are, after all, grim and purposeful institutions. They exist primarily to fight battles—and, more important, to win them. The first job of the service schools is to prepare leaders for these grim institutions; leaders who will be able to take care of the country's interests in time of war.

Now it would be very nice indeed if every admiral could and would read Horace in the original, write sonnets in his spare time, and hold up his end in a discussion of the theories of Adam Smith and Herbert Spencer. But if he couldn't handle a fleet in action he would be a total washout, and the money his country spent on his excellent education at Annapolis would be money tragically wasted.

John Paul Jones, after all, was a rather rough and uncouth chap who would doubtless have been ill at ease at a swanky London dinner table. When Farragut started his ships up the Missouri river, he needed to know his job as a sailor, not to be a polished and cultured gentleman. If Dewey had fozzled his assignment at Manila Bay it would have been scant consolation to know that he was an ardent admirer of Montaigne.

When we talk about "improving the curriculum" at Annapolis or West Point, we need to remember just what it is that those two schools are supposed to be doing.

Cotton Co-Ops Are Given a Clean Slate After Probe

DALLAS—With thirteen members of the committee voting, and by a vote of 11 to 2, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry early last week accepted the report prepared by Senators Bankhead and Ellender on the investigation of the American Cotton Cooperative Association of New Orleans and its affiliate, the Texas Cotton Growers Association.

The report, which summarized the testimony presented by the Cotton Cooperatives during a five-weeks hearing in Washington before a sub-committee headed by Senator Smith of South Carolina, sustained the cooperatives on every point raised under the Senate Resolution providing for the investigation, and turned down every charge made by Lawrence Westbrook, investigator for the committee. The five of the six members of the Committee on Agriculture from cotton states approved the Bankhead-Ellender report.

Principal point in the investigation concerned the classing of the 12-cent loan and 1933 Cotton Producers cotton, though the investigation did look into the bona fide of the members of the various state and regional associations; the financial set-up; directorates, speculation, investments in real estate, and loans from the Farm Credit Administration.

The committee found that while there was some variation between the classing of various lots of cotton, the evidence shows that the classing by the cooperatives was reasonably accurate considering the inexactness of existing methods of classifying and grading cotton.

The committee found that the memberships compiled with state and national cooperative laws and found no evidence that any of the members were dissatisfied with the conduct of the associations.

On the matter of finances it found the cooperatives were solvent, that they have not speculated in the market. The evidence disclosed in the report said, "that the American Cotton Cooperative Association is operated for the benefit of its members." It further found that salaries paid the management is probably "under that paid to other managers having like work and responsibilities in the cotton trade."

Commenting on the report, A. B. Emmert, general manager of the Texas Cotton Growers Association, states that while "the volume of cotton our members handle in their own association is the best evidence of what farmers think of it, this report is a welcome and appreciated vindication of the cotton cooperatives, and is a ringing answer to the many charges and rumors continually being made against the cooperatives by those who would profit by their destruction."

 Downhearted, Joe seeking work and the boss at a lunch-stand and is given it, amicably, alone.

CHAPTER XVIII
 After, but it was better, traveling alone. . . .
 . . . a time, in a small nameless town in a state, when Joe Murray was three who had blown in a wreck of an old when no virtue left but when so, there is a self about a car, for a car gasoline and oil, and they had funds. Where would a man get funds? They gave him a size, sizing him up for a one if so minded to be, the four of them rustled in a milligan in a jungle on the edge of the town. They were all younger than Joe even, and with the adamantine comes only from the of adversity on inborn.

Well, what it takes, and they're me. Only I don't wait for to bring it; I go out and and if I deprive them of feeling of giving some- the poor, that's their back. If they didn't have them alone. They got and that's their hard said, "H'm!" and looked at the battered car, dusty clothes, none too the pot simmering thinly fire.

They pur- ambitions too big for They fitted from town lighting like a mosquito, as far afterward. They safe and easy and com- you," said Red, speak-out of quick reflection and decision. "You throw in. We can stand the company. We'll set you on your feet."

 "What do I do?" asked Joe.
 "Come along and we'll show you. We've got a cinch eased for tonight. Stick along and you'll see."
 Joe shrugged. They would tell him no more, grinning. He was indifferent. But he went along to see.

THEY went at midnight. They drifted through the town. They were furtive, on edge, but sure of themselves. Joe followed. He had one injunction to follow: stick with them, no matter what! He could do that, he had nothing better to stick to. . . . and perhaps grimly relish the encounter with anything disputing the point.
 They drifted eventually up to a gasoline station which was the one point afloat and awake in that part of town. Joe looked at the sign; it was one of a chain in the town. There were two cars halted in the space; there were three men inside the office of the station. The day was ended; they were absorbed together.
 "Right!" said Red softly. "Sift around, you guys. I'll take the front."
 Joe trailed one of the pair circling, converging on the station. It was pretty clear now. There were four of them. Only three inside. The streets were empty. The owner was making up his account, his day's take. Joe had a clear picture: lunch wagons, all-night restaurants, gas stations, drug stores, they're all peculiarly helpless while the towns sleep.
 But on the gravel of the station, closing in, Joe stiffened. Red was walking boldly up to the office door—and there was a gun in Red's hand! Red opened the door, leveled the gun, and barked an order.
 Joe watched, cold.
 The three men inside turned quickly, astounded; then panic sprang into their eyes at sight of the gun bearing on them. All three sent their hands high. Joe could see through the glass a canvas bag on the desk and small piles of cash.
 Red snapped to one of his partners, "Come and get it! And look for a gun."
 The fellow darted inside, keeping out of line with the gun, edging to the desk and grabbing the money and stuffing it into his pockets.
 Joe waited, tense. The third partner stood across the space, watchful as a cat. Joe waited, his heart pounded, his mind raced, kaleidoscopic, resolving nothing. The night was very still. Some- where a stout twig snapped. . . .

 A long instant, and the fellow across the space yelled, "Lam, you guys! The bulls!"
 Through a thick dark hedge adjoining the gas station a powerful figure came crashing.

NONE of them, drifting stealthily through the town, had seen a yet stealthier shadow following. None had an inkling that a uniformed patrolman watched them encircle the gas station, a policeman who had left his beat in the grim certainty of what was coming. The hedge afforded the one quick means of approach, and he was upon them at one bound, shouting, gun drawn.
 Red spun on one heel, fired instantly, and ran. The cop came on. The fellow snatching the money inside the station made incontinently for the door. A hand grabbed him desperately and broke his stride; he shook it off and ran outside.
 The policeman fired point-blank and the youngster recoiled and then wilted and dropped to the gravel outside the door.
 Joe, off to the side, stood frozen. Red yelled to him from the shadows. The fourth member of the band had already vanished.
 Joe turned and ran toward Red, who was waiting. Red was waiting with an ugly ferocity in his eyes as he watched, over Joe's shoulder, the youngster dead on the gravel and the cop aiming his pistol at Joe.
 Red raised his own gun and fired. Joe stopped and looked back. The cop was falling, shot, striking the gravel heavily a dozen feet from the other body; and then there were two bodies motionless on the dark gravel.
 "C'mon!" snapped Red. "Out of here!"
 Joe got out of there with him, fleeing, racing in the night. And there was a fear now, a retching terrible fear that was worst of all after the danger was well behind them.
 "Let's scatter," he gasped to Red. "We better not stick together."
 "Meet us at the camp," Red agreed. "We'll hit for Royersville and ditch the car. Ten minutes!"
 Joe stepped into a pitch dark alley and was sick. . . . sick. The night was very still. After a time he went on through the alley.
 Joe rode a blind out of town that night, speeding westward. . . . alone.

Washington Note

Of 1752 Laments "Cruel Sentence"
 By United Press
PHILADELPHIA, Pa.—George Washington was disappointed in a young girl of 20 — seven years before he married Martha Washington — and it was a 15-year-old girl who gave him the "cruel sentence."
 The youthful love affair of the man who later was to become the nation's first President, is disclosed in a letter written by Washington on May 20, 1752, to William Fauntleroy, Sr., of Richmond, Va., grandfather of Betsy Fauntleroy, the belle with whom he was in love.
 In the letter, purchased by Col. Louis F. Kolb, Philadelphia banker, manufacturer and collector, Washington wrote:

"Sir, I should have been down long before this, but my business in Frederick detained me somewhat longer than I expected, and immediately upon my return from thence, I was taken with a violent pleurisy, which has reduced me very low; but purpose, as soon as I recover my strength, to wait on Miss Betsy, in hopes of a revocation of the former cruel sentence, and see if I can meet with any alteration in my favor. I have enclosed a letter to her, which should be much obliged to you for the delivery of it. I have nothing to add but my respects to your good lady and family.
 "G. Washington."
 A letter from Washington to his brother, Lawrence, written May 5, 1749, is the only earlier autograph letter of the first President extant, according to collectors. The handwriting of Col. Kolb's letter differs greatly from that which characterized Washington in later years.
 The story handed down with the letter is that "Miss Betsy" later

Summer Thirsts Are Turning to Beer

AUSTIN, Tex.—Summer thirsts are reflected in tax stamp sales of the state treasury. The last monthly report shows a decrease in receipts from liquor stamps and an increase in the beer stamp income.
 A man named Adams—not one of the Adamases who became President, however.
 Col. Kolb obtained the letter from a dealer who had bought it from a member of the Lee family of Virginia. A brief note—dated June, 1885, and signed by Ellen Bernard Lee—which accompanied the Washington letter says: "Given to me by Mrs. Mary Fauntleroy Barnes, the great, great niece of Betsy Fauntleroy."
 Few letters among the Washington correspondence which had been handed down during the last century and a half reveal anything of the romantic side of the first President's youth, collectors said.

HEROLD (MUDDY) RUEL, aide-de-camp to Jimmy Dykes, The Man With the Cigar, is developing into quite a philosopher these languid spring afternoons. "Look," he says to the White Sox's boss, "where there's smoke there's fire. So," he beams triumphantly, "where there's bats there's got to be base hits."
 Not so Herold, not so, Jimmy moans by way of reply. Dykes prefers to face the bitter truth with facts, rather than homely logic.
 The Pale Hose have been banging away at a very unfat average of six hits per contest, of late. Despite the fact that Dykes keeps reminding his athletes they're still maneuvering in the American League.
 The Sox just haven't been hitting. The pitching has been uniformly good, and the defense better than it has been in a long time. But no base hits.
 Nor does Dykes plan on a radical shakeup in his batting order. "If a batter can't hit in one position there's small chance he'll suddenly begin to pound the ball in another. So I'll let things ride as they are—for awhile, anyway," says Jimmy.
 Muddy Ruel, however, still thinks he has the right idea. He still thinks the Sox will snap out of it.
 "Don't forget," he warns, "where there are bats"
 It won't be long now before the powers that be may find themselves forced to do something about the low hurdle situation.
 To be explicit, the problem is whether or not the 220-yard low barriers should be retained in the

WASHINGTON WITH RODNEY DUTCHER

BY RODNEY DUTCHER
NEA Service Staff Correspondent
WASHINGTON—The most important current efforts to get business, labor and government together for a joint attack on the depression are being made in deepest secrecy.
 Assistant Secretary of the Treasury John W. Hanes is still the key man behind the curtains, despite earlier discouragements. Mr. Roosevelt has told Hanes to see what he can do and the former Wall Street broker is working diligently and earnestly, although taking his time and shunning publicity.
 Present plans call for an initial secret conference—of the country's five biggest industrialists, according to one insider, who refuses to identify them or even explain how anyone can really name the "five biggest"—at which no government official, except possibly Hanes, will be present. Certain labor leaders will be invited in and consulted. This meeting will not be held in Washington.
 After industrialists and labor leaders figure out what recommendations they can agree on, the idea is to call in a few score more business men, labor men and high government officials and toss at the country a program, partly legislative, which will be presented as the best combined thought of men in whom the country is presumed to have most confidence. Apparently no one figures on having this convention until after November's elections.
 The whole thing may fizzle early. Promises of co-operation from business men are sufficiently substantial, however, to make it worth watching.

Rookies Live Up To Notices In a Game In Eastland

The Wichita Falls Rookies lived up to advance notices Saturday night and a large audience of fans was treated to one of the best exhibitions of girl softball ever played on the local field. The final score of 3 for the Rookies to 2 for the Blues about represented the relative strength of the two teams as the game was played, but the difference is so close that the decision could easily be reversed in a subsequent game.

Both teams turned in sparkling plays afield and the excitement was intense to the last out. In the nightcap Street's Dairymaids managed to nose out the girls from Graham 15 to 14, after the lead saw-sawed back and forth throughout the game.

At Madison Square Garden Jitterbug Jubilee

New York's Madison Square Garden was turned into a jitterbughouse at a recent "Jitterbug Jubilee," put on for the benefit of the Los Angeles Sanitarium. For nine hours, against a background of such nerve-scraping swing music as "Flat Feet Floogie With the Floy Floy," by the bands of Count Basie and Benny Goodman, demagogues of demoniac dancing, 7500 addicts such as the two pictured above, stratted, stomped, shuffled, shagged, trucked, twisted, leaped, writhed, moaned and groaned.

With the first strains of "Boogie Woogie," swing addicts at New York's recent "Jitterbug Jubilee" crowded about the musicians and, as pictured above, assumed the tense, glassy-eyed, open-mouthed expression that has won them the name "hali-gators."

Pastor Offers Do's And Don'ts For a Happy Marriage

MEMPHIS, TENN. — Young men choosing a wife should be careful not to pick a "flapper" because she "might keep on flapping," according to the Rev. Ewart A. Autry, Memphis Baptist pastor, in listing the "do's" and "do's" for the prospective bridegroom.

His "do's":
Don't choose a woman who lives beyond her father's means. She will live beyond yours.
Don't marry a woman who tries to boss you before marriage. You will become a henpecked rabbit without an ounce of happiness.
Don't marry a woman who has to be remolded to suit your ideals. You might as well try to remold the rock of Gibraltar.
Don't wait for the perfect woman to come along. The perfect women of the world are all dead.
The Rev. Autry said "do" pick a wife who:
Has common sense. Many homes are wrecked because of lack of it.
Is morally decent. Moral indecency comes to the surface in later years.
Is neat. Not necessarily beautiful but not a slouch.
Has the qualifications of a mother. She might become one some day.

Surgery Making Over Receding Or Protruding Jaws

PHILADELPHIA — An operation used by dental surgeons to correct jutting or receding chins was described at Temple University Dental School at a program celebrating the school's 75th anniversary.

Dr. James R. Cameron, professor of oral surgery, said the operation was known technically as resection of the ramus, the short "handle" of the lower jaw which locks with the upper jaw in front of the ear.

The ramus is cut horizontally and the jaw moved forward or backward as much as a half inch, then the teeth are wired together until the bones knit, according to Dr. Cameron.

Originally the operation was used to help the chewing position of the jaws, he said, but the improvement in appearance effected for persons with unsightly chins has become another reason.

Firemen Fail, So They Rebuild Home

By United Press
CLATSKANIE, Ore. — When the Clatskanie fire department failed to prevent flames from destroying the home of E. B. Parton members of the force did the next best thing and built a new house. Before the fire died down, the department started making plans. The next day hammers and saws were applied and the firemen were joined by a score of other volunteers.

"There's The doorbell again"

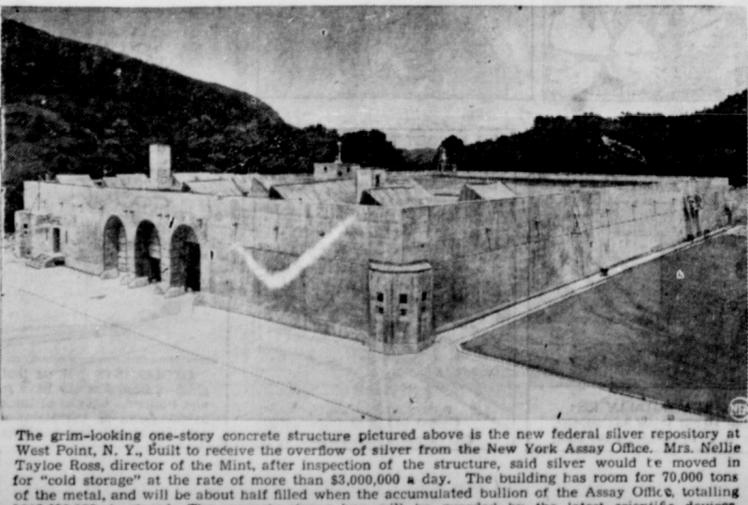

Suppose daily to your door came the butcher, the grocer, the clothier, the furrier, the furniture man, and every other merchant with whom you deal? What a tedium of doorbell answering that would mean!

It would be even more impractical for you to visit daily all these stores to find out what they have to offer and the price.

And yet you need those merchants' service quite as much as they need your patronage. Contact between seller and consumer is essential in the supplying of human needs. Before a sale can be closed the goods must be offered. Every day, through the advertising columns of this newspaper, the merchants of this city come to your home with their choicest wares. Easily, quickly, you get the news of all that is worth while in the market-places of the world.

They are not strangers at the door, but merchants you know and trust. You are always surer of high quality and fair price when you buy an article advertised by a reputable firm.

'Cold Storage' for Uncle Sam's Silver

The grim-looking one-story concrete structure pictured above is the new federal silver repository at West Point, N. Y., built to receive the overflow of silver from the New York Assay Office. Mrs. Nellie Taylor Ross, director of the Mint, after inspection of the structure, said silver would be moved in for "cold storage" at the rate of more than $3,000,000 a day. The building has room for 70,000 tons of the metal, and will be about half filled when the accumulated bullion of the Assay Office, totalling $646,400,000, is stored. The concrete strong box will be guarded by the latest scientific devices.
