Mr. and Mrs. V. H. Mendenhall of El Dorado, Ark, prepare to leave Pampa for Amarillo enroute to Hollywood, Calif., via wheelchair and rides, to be on Art Linkletter's TV show. The couple spent last night here in the home of Mr. and Mrs. R. N. Hassell, 854 S. Banks, after the local couple picked up the wayfarers near Canadian. The Mendenhalls told The News yesterday the wheel chair, which holds Mrs. Mendenhall, has "about 20,000" miles on it. They made a trip to New York from El Dorado last year, returning via Miami Beach, Fla., with Mendenhall pushing his wife nearly all the way (they accept car rides) and plan to get to Hollywood, where Mrs. Mendenhall will get braces for her legs, in the same (News Photo)

Who's A Lobbyist?

Senate investigators, spurred by evidence of hitherto secret, tax-deductible, multi-million dollar propaganda programs, are pressing for an answer to the question: When is a lobbyist not a lobbyist?

The answer, backed by a Supreme Court decision seems to be: When he spends the money to "educate" the public to his point of view.

Chairman John L, McClellan (D-Ark.) and his colleagues on the Special Senate Lobby investigating Committee have unearthed no bribes and no scandals in their study of pressures for and against the natural gas bill, vetoed by President Eisenhower last February.

But they have learned almost $2 million was spent to stir public opinion on the controversial measure, and most of the activity was not covered by the existing Lobby Regulation Act.

McClellan has asked publicly if something should be done to bring such spending under federal supervision. Here's what disturbs McClellan:

The General Gas Committee, which favored the bill, spent $119,988 in "developing the facts and carrying these facts to the people . .

The Natural Gas and Oil Resources Committee, also in favor of the bill, spent $1,753,513 on a "continuing long-range program of education and information."

The United Automobile Workers (AFL-CIO), opposed to the bill, spent $38,762 for newspaper and radio advertisements.

None of the three groups is registered as a lobby. Current law would not require any of them to disclose its spending on the gas bill.

Another group opposed to the bill, the Council of Local Gas Companies, is a registered lobby. The $27,699 it spent included expenses for buttonholing Congressmen and a publicity campaign against the bill.

When Congress in 1946 first brought lobby activity under regulation, it drafted a set of rules broad enough apparently to cover both direct and indirect lobbying. It required registration and regular financial reports from any person who "for pay or any consideration" attempts to influence Congress either "directly or indi-

The Lobby Regulation Act was so broad that a federal court decided, in the case of U.S. vs. Harris, it violated Constitutional guarantees of free speech and the right to petition the government "for a redress of griev-

The case came to the Supreme Court in 1954 and Chief Justice Earl Warren, speaking for a five-man ma jority, upheld the constitutionality of the lobby act. However, he limited its coverage to persons in "direct communication with Members of Congress on pending or proposed federal legislation.

Indirect lobbying was freed from controls "to avoid constitutional doubts." Warren said Congress "would have intended the act to operate on this narrower basis, even if a broader application to organizations seeking to propagandize the general public were not permissible." Three dissenting judges said the Chief Justice had "rewritten the law" to save it from being ruled unconsti-

This Supreme Court decision - and the issues of civil liberties it raises — are the crux of the problem with which McClellan and his colleagues are wrestling.

The Senator says he agrees with the late Justice Robert H. Jackson's observation: "To reach the real evils of lobbying without cutting into the constitutional right of petition is a difficult and delicate task."

But McClellan says he wants his committee to consider at least two questions once "the whole pattern of lobby activities" has been explored:

Should tax laws continue to permit businesses to deduct expenditures for "educational" programs aimed at swaying public opinion on national issues? Should the law be changed to require lobbyists to identify themselves as such in their appeals to the public and Congress?

Man's Emerging Mind always read every book Rose Wilder Lane recommends to me. She recently recommended three books. The first one I read of these recommendations was "Man's Emerging Mind" by N. J.

It seems to me the emerging of man's mind should be an interesting subject to any man who is interested in knowing why things happen. The book proved to be very interesting to me.

Man's mind has evidently emerged very, very slowly. In fact, in the first place, it is very difficult to define man. Berrell admits that it is difficult to accurately define man. He writes: ... Man is a spirit and man is an animal, the one is as certain as the other and we have little to gain and much to lose by forgetting either of them. We cannot even safely say that the duality of spirit and animal covers the whole reality - words are themselves treacherous and moreover our brains are the product of a peculiar set of circumstances and may all too likely contain builtin blinkers as if we carry a torch in the darkness and cannot see beyond the margin of the light. Our humanness itself is hard to define, simply in terms of what distinguishes us from all other animals-To say that we have a soul and the rest do not begs the question and is at least debatable. Perhaps we should ask instead how much of a soul and start admitting dogs and chipmunks into the kingdom of heaven. It wold better befit our sta-

"It is simple enough to describe a man in certain ways, to say that he is so big, that he walks on two legs in place of four, has a pair of eyes and so many toes and so on. It amounts to a visual sketch and supplies a recognisable portrait of a kind which would distinguish him from an elephant or a shark. But it would leave out what all we who live have in common, which is the sheer quality of a flame. From the moment of conception until we die, we burn as literally as a candle. This is no casual simile for we both consume and are consumed, and death come when the process stops. As long as we live, as in the case of the candle, oxygen and other substances are drawn in, take their place and burn with the release of engery and other end products, until at last the process of replacement drops below consumption and the flame of life and candle flicker out.

Then the author observes that "The sense of time is one of the greater mysteries, for the mind itself keeps time although not necessarily the same as the body, for states of mind affect one's estimation of it. Concentration on work in hand makes time pass one third faster than when idle; doubt and anxiety slow it down." * * * *

"We are a time-binding species and perhaps more than any other we have become a time-binding generation intent on reconstructing the past billion years and forecasting our planetary future. Which is why I am writing this, for it is a comprehenson and an interest that increases as one grows older. In fact one of the great consolations life has to offer a mankind that is rapidly increasing in average age is that the process of aging affects the mind much less than the body. Minds get rusty more for lack of operation than for any basic deterioration in the equipment. In contrast to all other time-changes in the organism, mental potency as a whole rises sharply until the age of forty and continues to rise thereafter, al though at a decreasing rate, until a climax is reached at about sixty. Then there is a slow decline through the next twenty years though even at eighty the mental standard is still as good as it was at thirty-five. It is a different mind but no less valuable. And only an old pigmented brain produces that particular mixture of knowledge, experience and contemplation which is the reaction of intelligence to the changing circumstances of a long life. Wisdom, the highest product of the human mind, comes late: the young are rarely wise and are not expected to be. My own brain I am sure is as yet unpigmented, for neither my age nor my actions indicates sufficient wisdom. But 'the last of life, for which the first was made' is a line to remember, for the mind dominates in later years and grows only upon what it has been fed. How far it can fathom itself have yet to learn." Mr. Berrell, of course, gives the archeologist's method of measuring time. He divides it up into some 60 million years. The oldest named time is Eccene, 20 million years then Oligocene, 11 million years; next Miocene, 17 million years; followed by Pliocene, 11 million years and the surrounding universe we and last Pleistocene, 1 million Then he relates how the horse has helped mankind understand the devolpment of animals and time. This is the way he puts it: "The little five-toed dawn horse. Echippus of the Eccene, became the large one-tood modern horse, Equus of the Pleistocene, in the course of about sixty million years." Webster's dictionary says that Echippus is a "small primitive four-toed horse from the lower Eocene of the western U.S." Mr. Berrell explains this 60 million years saying: "The total period is that indicated by the geologic and radioactive evidence. But in between the beginning and the end Eohippus took its time to transform step by little step from a creature that Perish The Thought Couldn't Stand Glitter HOLLYWOOD (UP) - Unemployed painter Clifford Frazer, 31, said he drove his car through the big window of an auto show room because he was "mad at the world." Frazer said he was musing about being unable to get work Sunday when he nrove past the showroom. The sight of the new cars inside was too much for him, he said, and he swerved his auto through the window, hitting one of the new cars and causing some $3,000 damage.
