range-battled the multiple hazards of the cow business, and won.

By J. EVETTS HALEY

ILLUSTRATED BY H. D. BUGBEE

Not even casual consideration of the story of cows can pass up that empire of grass in southern Colorado that was dominated by the JJ brand. In the generous if not precise language of the West, it "covered all out-doors." Its herds grazed from the headsprings of the Apishapa, in the cool evening shade of the Greenhorns, clear down the southern drainage of the Arkansas into Kansas. From the parallel and grass-grown ruts of is that men remember the JJ brand, the Santa Fe Trail, their cattle proud symbol of the greatest Colonosed their way south in search of rado range, and, more important the best grasses beyond the Raton still, the ear-mark of sturdy human Range, to mingle at last with the Cross L cattle in the same owner-When, in the late sixties, the ship along the Cimarron, below the New Mexico line. To say the least their land was ample.

More important for them than herds and grass however-vitally important as they may be-were. the traditions of fortitude that sustain a race of men and a way of life through the many vicissitudes that naturally beset those who tear their living from the soil. Despite a popular impression, there are tougher sides to ranching than gaily sitting on a horse.

In the ebb and flow of the seasons, lush years come and go and good times give way to bad. The waters dry up and the grasses fail and unusual booms are offset by deficits and depressions. But the spirit that animates the souls of hardy men devoted to the soil strives and struggles on. Thus it nature in battle with the weather.

Jones brothers—Jim, Pate and Steve-left the frontier of Texas at Jacksboro and came up the Goodnight Trail, they liked the looks of southern Colorado. Jim Jones, with the JJ brand, settled in the Nine Mile Bottom of the Purgatoire River south of La Junta, at present Higbee, and their cattle spread out on virgin grass up and down the Arkansas. The world was then open and free, and these Texans not only knew how to appropriate range, but they were good at converting grass to beef.

Their holdings really grew, and when, in 1880, Underwood, Clark & Company, of Kansas City, be-gan scouring the Western World for the best ranches for their Scottish clients, their agent found and contracted the JJ range rights and herds-locally estimated at 55,000 head of cattle, and all of Colorado that they could claim and hold. Thus the "Mother of the British Companies" came to Colorado.

There is a persistent story on the ranges of this region that the Prairie had bought so cheaply that they paid off their original investment during the first two years, and still had plenty of cattle left to stock their country. The balance sheets of the business hardly support this optimistic account, for, upon reappraisal of their position in 1889, the Company found that they had only 22,000 cattle on this, their Arkansas Division, and instead of their boasted 150,000 cattle of a few years before, their total on all their ranges was only 56,000 head

The multiple hazards of the range had taken a heavy toll. Oldtimers still like to recall that during the winter of 1885, a short-gaited cowpuncher could have walked for twenty-five miles down the river on dead cattle, from the ranch into Las Animas, "without putting a foot on the ground." That experience almost put the JJs out of the cow business.

But there was one saving grace. After the snows were gone, the land, responsive to sun and rain, was still there. And the lasting return of honest struggle with the soil is a goodly profit in human character, if not in a heavy balance at the bank. So for years the three JJ chuckwagons regularly rolled out from their headquarters on the Picket Wire for the spring work, and swept the country clean for their drifting cattle down through the corner of Kansas and back into New Mexico. At last the heavens smiled a little, their returns fell well on the profit side of the ledger, and, with success achieved, they could afford to quit. They sold out the last of their cattle in 1917, and the most fantastic of all the foreign range ventures faded into forgetfulness.

Not so, however, the significant symbolism of the JJ brand! It is still recalled with wonder and awe on the high lands of Colorado. though the capital, care and courage it once entailed and provoked are now channeled into other pursuits. Times have changed. The great cattle ranches that brought color and character to the Southwest are largely gone. Fortunes were lost and made. Vigorous men toiled out their time and died.

But their real heritage remains a thing of the spirit. It persists today in an expansive and generous attitude toward life, a zestful and courageous point of view, and a high regard for honorable tradition. It hovers over these vanished grasslands as a sort of an aura of gentility-the mark and brand of indestructible character-the genuine heraldry of the open range.

In the last issue I quoted from Oliver Martin's booklet "Two Educators: Hutchins and Conant" published by the Henry Regnery Company. The pamphlet compares the ideologies of Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago; and James B. Conant. president of Harvard University.

The last article contained the expression "moral nihilism" which is a phrase descriptive of the view The Russians continually use the British and French zones were ethical reasoning is imposthat sible. "It is true that in many moral problems encountered by a person, the philosophical question is not an issue. In this case the end is given and the only problem is the practical one on the level

If in a particular situation the end given is duty to one's country, then the problem is the practical one of finding the best means available. If, however, the situation is such that there is a conflict loyalties and ultimate values of -in this case a conflict between duty to country and duty to something else, say, humanity, or Godthen the problem is essentially a theoretical one. The practical can-

No one would be fooled or be misled. Nietzche had such courage and clarity, and hence is worthy of historical fame. It is often the 'good' people who mislead and confuse the most. This may seem paradoxical, but let us remember ideas long held by respectable, ideas long held by respectable, ideas long held by respectable, 'good' people. Goering could deny morality outright. But he would not have been in a position to act accordingly had not the groundwork long been laid by those people who had denied morality in the name of morality.
