The Panhandle-Plains Review has the Panhandle-Plains and, indeed, almost the entire Southwest from which to draw the entire highly interesting source matter, and the sifting and presenting of this by professional historians raises it to the front rank among such publications from its inception.

Every newspaper and lib rary will wish a permanent file and additional numbers will be welcomed as they appear. The service the Society is rendering in obtaining and permanently recording the memoirs of such men as Charles Goodnight is incalculable in view of the interest which is and will continue to be growing in the Panhandle. The link between the present and the more distant past in this section is larger than usually imagined, and the persons who can span the gap by memory are passing rapidly. Research now is manifestly more important than it will be ten years from now. Newspaper files are at last being kept faithfully by many editors, but this is a late practice and many precious volumes of early Panhandle publications long ago perished.
