"Religion and the Rise Of Capitalism"

(Continued) I want to quote further from the timely book "Religion and the Rise of Capitalism" by R. H.

Tawney. The author explains how John Locke summarized the develop-ment of religious ideas. I quotet "Most significant of all, economic interests were already appealing to the political theory which, when finally systematized by Locke, was to prove that the State which interferes with property and business destroys its own title to exist, 'All free subjects,' declared a Committee of the House of Commons in 1604, 'are born inheritable, as to their land, so also to the free exercise of their industry, in those trades whereto they apply themselves and whereby they are to live. Merchandise being the chief and richest of all other, and of greater extent and importance than all the rest, it is against the natural right and liberty of the subjects of England to restrain it into the hands of some few.' The process by which natural justice, imperfectly embodied in positive law, was replaced as the source of authority by positive law which might or might not be the expression of natural justice, had its analogy in the rejection by social theory of the whole conception of an objective standard of economic equity. The law of nature had been invoked by medieval writers as a moral restraint upon the nomic self-interest. By seventeenth century, a significant revolution had taken place. 'Nature' had come to connote, not divine ordinance, but human appetites, and natural rights were invoked by the individualism of the age as a reason why self-interest should be given free play."

Locke's Theory Debased

There is no reason why the daministration should fight what some philosophy of its own inevitably accepts that which happens to be fashionable."

That seems to be exactly what we are doing today. People accept public education because it is fashionable. It is not based on any moral law. I duote again:

"It was still more the political flower and political flower and political flower and theory associated with the name of Locke, but popularized and debased by a hundred imitators. Society is not a community of classes with varying functions, united to each other by mutual obligations arising from their relation to a seomonany rather than an organism, company rather than an organism, and many accepts that which possesses and philosophy of its own inevitably accepts that which happens to be fashionable."

Locke's Theory Debased

In short, the inconclusive Supreme Court decision against "restricted" real estate covenants may have removed the broader question form of government. And when one reads the works of John Locke, written 75 to 100 years before the Declaration of Independence, one sees the great similarity in his ideas and those expressed in the Declaration.

The author of this book gives Locke a lot of credit. I quote:

"An institution which possesses no philosophy of its own inevitably accepted that those contents against "restricted" real estate covenants may have removed the broader question against "restricted" real estate covenants may have removed the broader question of Civil Rights from the broader question of Civil Rights from this problem without alienating the millions of colored voters in the North and the Midwest. For them it is settled insofar as jurists and politicians can settle anything.
