Sunday School Entertains.

Last Thursday evening Mr. Robt. M. Webb's lawn presented a gala appearance. Japanese lanterns of many colors were lavishly strung above the walk in front, while myriads of electric lights radiated from tree and shrub, some of them flirting with the moon from the tops of the tallest trees, or making goo-goo eyes at the bright and happy children beneath.

The occasion was an entertainment and reception given by the officers and teachers of the Bautist Sunday school to its pupils, which included the Home Department and the Cradle

The weather was favorable and nearly three hundred were present. It was a joyous sight. The piano had been moved out on the spacious front porch, which was brilliantly lighted and prettily decorated. When asked to guess the meaning of the charade some bright boy or girl called out "Bob Webb." Peals of merriment followed.

With fresh horses and a full pack the Cherrycow outfit left the horse camp with a brave heart, prepared once more to round up cattle, cut out cows and calves, brand and move on, until the spring was gone. The first day out we camped at Warm Springs, where the cattle come in by thousands to drink the tepid water, and the boys crawled into their beds early, for there would be work enough in the morning. No, they did not wrap themselves in a single blanket and, with their heads pillowed upon their saddles, sink into a dreamless sleep—that was Willie Wise, the boy scout. The Cherrycow men don't spend one-third of their lives in bed, by any means, but that, as one of them remarked, snuggling down into his Ostermoor mattress, is all the more reason why they should sleep comfortably. Those who did not sport mattresses had folding cots with two comforts for padding and two pair of blankets for covers. Every man in the outfit had a "tarp" of heavy canvas, eighteen feet long by eight wide, and most of them had tents, too, for a cowboy has to meet all kinds of weather and his bed is all the home he has. They would not even "throw in" with each other, as of yore, but each man had his separate bed, and it took a good horse to carry it. Only in the matter of his pillow is the cowboy still economicalit is the same old war bag, made out of ticking and stuffed with his entire wardrobe, his cigarette papers and all his worldly goods. With his head on that he sinks into a brief and dreamless sleep, broken only by the rough hand of some partner who wakes him to stand his guard or the shouting of that human alarm clock, the cook.

It was three a. m. when Sam woke up, looked at the stars, scratched a match to see if his dollar watch was still running, and flew at the job of cooking breakfast for twenty. At four he let "Eeeec-yow!"—all that was left after many years hard usage of "Git up!" A faint yip from the mesa where the horses were feeding told us that the night guard had heard the welcome summons and ten minutes later they came tearing in over the top of the hill, leaving the remuda for the Indian horse wrangler to pick up. By the time the Incky boys who had not been elected to stand guard had rolled out of their beds stamped on their boots, washed up, and then religiously wiped their faces on the black towel kept for that purpose. As the cook swung the ponderous covers off his ovens there was a general scramble for cups and plates and when he said "Go to it!" they responded to a man. In one deep oven there was meat cut in slices and fried in grease: the other contained sour-dough biscuits -white and regular-and there was coffee in the pot, but every man made a point for the mush. Can after can of evaporated milk was punctured and thrown away empty, the sugar-sack stood open with a cup in it, but not until the mush kettle was scraped clean would the childlike cowboys give up their "lick and sweetness" and go back to "good hard grub."

It was still dark when the clatter of stones announced the arrival of the remuda, but the boss immediately rose up, placed his plate and cup in the dish pan -for even the boss makes that concession to the cook-and said: "Well boys, hurry up now and catch your hawses!" The days work had begun. First the great remuda was driven into the frail corral, which every minute threatened to go down before their furious rushes, and as the sea of heads flashed by or was huddled up insome corner the punchers roped out their horses and led them forth to be saddled. In the horse- changing at Blue river every man had drawn five fresh horses-two gentle ones and three bronks-but in the cold chill of early dawn even the gentle mounts were mean and wild. At sight of a saddleblanket they flew back twenty feet and every time a saddle was swung up onto a wild one he bucked it off and kicked at it. Here once more was a sination which none of the Christian virtues would solve and soon the canyon was filled with the sound of cursing and scuffling as man after man relapsed into savagery and fought it out among the rocks. When, with the help of two "bronco-twisters," whose business and ones, all the animals were saddled up, the "topping off" began. Those who had gentle horses mounted first in order der to keep the wild ones away from the thorny mesquites and hackberries, and then, as cowboy after cowboy crawled his pitching "bronk" and went plunging away over the water-washed boulders, the cliffs echoed to whoops and shouts and peals of barbaric laughter, growing fainter and fainter as the outfit dashed up the steep trail and spread out for the morning's gather.

In little parties of three and four the round-up hands rode away, each heading through some draw or "saddle" for his particular station. The silence of the wilderness once more settled down upon the deep canyon and the immense plain that lies above it, dotted as far as the eye can see with herds of grazing cattle. Then suddenly a dark line appeared in the distance, a line that wavered and changed with the rushing of horsemen behind it, and all the nearby cattle stopped grazing and raised their heads to listen. Clear and shrill, yet pinched to an insect-like faintness, came the high-keyed whoops of the cowboys, and as the line drew nearer the long drawn out syllables of their yelling became plain.

"Aye-aye-aye! Yeeee-pah! Ah-hah-hah-hah!" We learned those yells from the Indians, so they say, and there is certainly something barbarous in the shrill chorus, rising like the cry of prairie wolves above the bawling of cows and calves and the thunderous roaring of bulls. As the line advanced toward the cutting ground every dark canyon along the way belched forth its quota of flying steers followed by cowboys on nimble steeds that skated over the rocks like lizzards. With tumultuous and mournful cries they drifted down towards the open space before the pole corral and there in a mighty chorus they bellowed out their protest, shifting and winnowing as mothers sought ed sullenly through the midst. According to law no calf can be branded unless it is with its mother, and as many of them had been separated in the drive it was necessary to let them get together before the cutting could begin. While these reunions were being consummated the cowboys jogged over to the branding corral, into which George, the Apache horse-wrangler, had already driven the remuda, to change mounts. The Cherrycow outfit always has an Indian for horse-wrangler-the boys say it is because no white man will take the job-but George seemed to think it was "alright." That was his pet word and they kept him using it, too. When he wasn't hunting horses or grazing the remuda along the draws he was dragging up wood for the cook or doing a little job of shoeing. Four hours sleep was about all he could count on, for he had to stand night guard with the rest of them yet as soon as they woke him up he would begin to sing Indian tunes; and all day as he sat on some little hill with his horses feeding below he would tap two sticks together and chant:

"He, hee-yah; hee-yah; heeeee!" as if he were king of all that land.

The midday changing of mounts was generally the occasion for an outbreak FIVE— Cherrycow eicoeeee ayRdd on the part of the "bronks." In the early morning the cowboys were afraid to tackle their bronco horses, but in the heat of the noonday their courage rose and man after man caught up a "wild one." In case any of them refused to pitch, the puncher threw the spurs into him and beat him over the head with his hat-and after the dust had settled the horse was considered to be officially uncocked. This pleasing Western ceremony being over, and the cattle by that time settled down, the boys returned to begin the cutting while George took the remuda out to fill them up again on Gutting is the one job where the Texans feel repressed. It has to be done quietly. No whooping, rough riding or fancy swearing goes. The wagon boss and three or four of the steadiest hands ride slowly about through the immense herd of eattle until they have identified the mothers of most of the calves; then being careful to keep them together, they work the cows and calves out to the edge and stampede them across the open into a hold up herd. With a big herd they cut from two sides at once. the remainder of the outfit being kept busy holding the cattle and turning back strays. It was a tedious process, but two hours after the work began every calf with a bona-fide mother had been cut out and the main herd was turned loose to drift back once more to its accustomed grounds. Then the bawling cows and calves were thrown into the strong branding corral and left to think it over while the outfit raced back to camp-two miles-for

Branding is a brutal job, but it only happens once, and with the Cherrycow outfit it happens quick. They use the Texas method, which is much quicker than the Mexican, tie-down style though it takes more men. When the battery of stamp-irons has been heated red-hot over the long fire, two cowboys with their throw ropes tied short to the horn of their saddles, ride out into the herd, get a calf to stepping and noose him by the hind foot. He is then dragged up to the fire, where a "bull-dogger" catches him across the shoulders and throws him. Instantly another man seizes him by the upper hind foot, sits down, and places his boot against the lower hind leg, meanwhile, throwing loose the rope. The poor calf is no sooner held than two cheery gentlemen with hot irons begin to burn C's on him, while another works over the cars with a sharp knife. There is a cloud of white smoke, a single agonized bawl, and all is over. The calf has a large C on his jaw, and a larger one still on his shoulder and hip; his left ear is notched to a swallowfork and his right "sharped" to a point; he is a little dogie, and if he is good he will be a beef-steer bye-and-bye. The ear-marker puts the keys from the swallowforks in his hip pocket as he proceeds and when the branding is over the boss counts them solemnly in the fence corner, writing the talley in his book. Then the cows and calves are turned loose and the outfit lopes back to camp thirsty and tired and grimed to the ears with dirt. There was a great race down to the water that first "evening." but as soon as the boys had got a drink and turned their horses into the corral half of them lopped down on their blankets and fell asleep before Sam could serve up the supper. It is hard work, cow punching.

The sun dropped down behind the high canyon wall while the outfit was seated sullenly in the dirt, eating; but as the cool night wind sucked up the ravine and the coffee soothed their weariness the Cherrycow boys gathered about the camp fire, moving closer as the coals died down, and told stories of the only world they knew-stories of the old-time drives from Texas to Wyoming and Montana; of romantic adventures in Chihuahua and Old Mexico; of long and wintry rides on the chuckline, when all the ranches were full handed and nobody would take on a poor cowboy; of fierce happenings in frontier cow-towns and the transcendent glories of a Fourth in Globs, Painted in the gaudy coloring of their vernacular the life of a puncher took on the halo of the great romance-that lure which has drawn so many thousands to the West; but just as the gloomiest of them were warming to the theme the gaunt shadow of the wagon boss fell across the firelight and broke the spell of dreams.

"Well, boys," he said, "you'd better take the hawses out now-it's night onto a mile to any feed. John, you and Jess stand the first guard; Tom and Bishop second; George and Kinch third; Lee and Albert fourth. Take your beds with you and start 'em towards camp as soon as you c'n see light -we're goin' on to Hackberry in the mawnin.'
