Sex education belongs in Texas public schools

Julie Mitchell/columnist

Why is it that some people are still pushing to get sex education taught in public school? Have these folks forgotten about the long standing Texas tradition of learning about sex from one's friends? There is no need to waste tax dollars on an educated teacher. Qualified peers can offer a fellow student hands-on training, and not too many teachers can claim that.

When I was in the seventh grade, a girl in my class became pregnant. The seventh grade! Here I was still thinking that sex was a bad word (having only the slightest clue what it meant) as I watched this swollen-bellied girl walk through the halls. All I could think was "I bet her belly button is gonna hurt when that baby pops out of it."

She obviously didn't have any friends. If she had friends, they would have explained to her that drinking a lot of water while jumping up and down prevents pregnancy. And she must not have been at school that one day in the fifth grade when the girls and guys were separated and we watched that 30minute video about "relations." If she had been there, she surely would have known enough about sex to prevent her pregnancy.

When my class entered high school, the school board suddenly realized, "Hey, these kids' parents aren't telling them about sex. We'd better do something before we have a population problem." So, my freshman year we had a health class in which we watched sex education films for about a week.

Unfortunately, not too many people paid attention. There was a couple in To the editor: I read with great interthe back of the room that were too busy making out to watch the movie, and there was one girl whose kid was sick so she wasn't even there. That was as much formal sex education as I got. The county in which my more government spending and conhometown is located has the second highest pregnancy rate in Texas, and the trol. only sex education it offers is a movie in the fifth grade and a few in the ninth grade. One would hope that the desire to prevent teen-age pregnancy would be enough of a motivation to implement sex education in school. Since this desire is obviously not enough of a motivation, one would hope that the desire 2425. Harmon did not give the title of can't have this kind of bad publicity. Election year creates budget hassles

Fort Worth Star-Telegram on good budget news:

You know it must be an election year when there's a tussle about who gets to announce — and take credit for — ordinary news about government finances.

In this case, however, there is good news. The Treasury Department apparently will soon announce that the budget deficit for fiscal 1996, which recently ended, will be about $109 billion. That means the federal government spent $109 billion more than it took in, which is good news because (1) as recently as August a $116 billion deficit was predicted; (2) the deficit will have dropped for the fourth year in a row; (3) this is the lowest deficit since 1981; and (4) at 1.5 percent of the gross domestic product, the deficit equals Dirks makes bad move the smallest percentage of the GDP since 1974

The House and Senate Budget Committee chairmen, Rep. John Kasich, R-Ohio, and Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., say it proves that Congress can control spending. At the same time, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget says it shows the impact of President Clinton's 1993 economic

They are both right. But they also should credit the 1990 budget package compromise between President Bush and a Congress with Democratic majorities. That set "pay-as-you-go" limits making it much more difficult to increase spending. The 1990 package never got the respect it deserved because Bush agreed to higher taxes, breaking an unwise campaign pledge. But it has been the basis for declining deficits beginning in fiscal 1993

Meanwhile, both the White House and Congress surely realize that there isn't much time for patting themselves on the back. Deficits will start rising again in 1997, which means that even tougher budget choices are ahead.
