Trend For Narrow Crop Rows Is Growing Among Farmers

By BILL HORN
East Texas State College

By observing cornfields in the Midwest, many farmers are beginning to follow a new trend, that of narrower spacing of crop rows, because of the possibility of a higher yield.

Forty-inch rows are being replaced by thirty-inch rows because the forty-inch width was the amount of space a horse needed to pass between rows. Now horses are seldom used.

The trend toward thirty-inch rows is based on three reasons. (1) The corn leaves can spread more advantageously for sunlight when the plants are more liberally distributed. (2) The leaves shade weeds, and (3) the roots can spread in more different directions. This trend does not mean a higher plant population per acre, but simply more equi-distant spacing of plants and rows.

Machinery companies are anticipating this trend by producing planters, combines and forage harvesters for the thirty-inch width.

The case for the changeover must be carefully weighed. The advantage of the thirty-inch row is a possible five to ten percent increase in yield for corn. According to some experiments this increase cannot be expected unless there is already a high yield level.

There are several factors that may influence the results. For example, the varieties of corn respond differently to population. Early planting dates seem more advantageous, because the difference in days can mean the difference in heights of the stalks. The fertility of the soil, along with the rainfall, can determine the yield. Also the danger of root pruning with a cultivator makes herbicides essential. Finally, in most cases, new equipment must be used. Therefore, you, the farmer, must compare the cost of changeover to the anticipated profit of the potential increase in yield.

In the selection of hybrids, the different characteristics must be considered because different varieties have various responses to population. There are different heights of stalks, and standing abilities.

An interesting suggestion for a plant with upright leaves with the low angle of leaf attachment... would allow better distribution of light, and shade neighboring plants less."

Another factor in selection is the fertility and rainfall which influences the hardness of the stalk. There should be a direct relationship of day length to stalk height, and that a short stalk is more desirable in an area of high humidity where stalk rot poses a problem.

The wrong hybrid in regard to plant population can result in barren stalks and small ears. Ralph Schubert, the marketing director for Pfister Association Growers of Aurora, Illinois, says:

"Too many people are stepping up population excessively without regard to hybrids or fertility. When excessive populations induce lodging, narrow rows tend to get the blame."

But the success of the change does not depend upon the hybrid alone, but upon the wise judgment of the farmer.

As for the cost, the changeover for corn producers is going to average more than $1,500 per 300 acre farm. During the last several years there has been an importance placed on application of accounting practices to every business phase of farming. The farmer must plan his expenditures for machinery and balance the cost against his expected profit. The new equipment is probably the most expensive aspect, but good equipment is only the beginning. It must be kept in perfect working order. This is especially true of planters. The farmer can be no better than the man who drives it. Again, emphasis is placed upon you and your own judgment.

The farmer should not misunderstand the idea of increased yield and higher profit by the thirty-inch rows before considering the particular crop, geographical region,

Do-it-yourself tree surgery should be limited to repair work on small trees and damaged limbs near the ground. Everett E. Monne, Texas A&M University Extension landscape horticulturist, warns that it is best to hire a trained arborist to do the job if the ice damaged tree is large or the breakage has occurred high in the branches. Recent ice storms have broken and splintered shade trees as a result of the heavy coating of ice. This was true of many of the evergreen types, especially the Live Oak. An extremely heavy coating of ice on the dense foliage broke many of the larger branches, Janne said. Prompt attention and proper treatment of the damaged trees will aid materially in preventing permanent disfigurement and possible premature death. While the tree wounds are still fresh, much of the repair work can be done with a sharp pruning saw and wound dressing. Janne said fledging tree surgeons should follow these simple guidelines. The damaged branches should be removed flush with the trunk or nearest large branch. Stubs will only lead to a proliferation or summer growth later on, always cut back to a side branch. To prevent additional damage to the tree in removing heavy limbs, make the first cut with a saw from the bottom side of the limb about 12 inches from the main branch. When the saw starts to bind make the second cut from above about eight inches from the main branch. After the limb splits off remove the remaining stub with a saw cut parallel to the main branch. Lastly, apply a tree wound dressing to the exposed surface to prevent the entrance of dis-
