Senator Hightower Stays Busy with Duties in Capitol

What's a week or a day like or a Senator? During this session of the Texas Legislature, the 23rd District's new Senator is putting in many busy days. Senator Jack Hightower meets with ten major Senate ommittees each week as a voting member of the committees. He also chairmans one committee. Each bill introduced in the Senate must go to a committee where the public has an opportunity to express its views. So, with many committee responsibilities, a Senator's day is full.

On most days the Senator from District 23 grabs a candy bar for lunch and cheese and crackers for supper. It's the only way to attend to business for the Senator who reads every newspaper from his district, answers an ever-increasing volume of mail and maintains an 'open door' policy in his office at the Capitol in Austin and in the district on week ends. Hightower spends a great deal of time studying proposed bills so that when he casts his vote it will have been weighed carefully.

Senator Hightower has proposed legislation of purely local interest, as well as some basic changes in laws. To date, he has authored 22 different measures. What's a typical day like on Capitol Hill? Last week, the Senate met almost all day on Monday. On Tuesday, Hightower attended first an insurance committee hearing, then a state affairs committee hearing, all before the Senate convened for the morning session. That day, he had lunch with some constituents meeting with the Texas Historical Survey Association. He participated on the program of a legislative workshop of the Baptist General Convention at 2:30 in the afternoon. He returned to the Capitol and met with Governor Connally on district leg-

History of Barbed Wire Tells History of Cattle Industry

The ten years following the Civil War were marked by a tremendous increase in the meat packing industry, thus the cattle ranchers needed plenty of space to expand their herds and improve their stock. Scrub cattle and mea ger watering facilities resulted their herds and dug water wells on the open range to insure these grass' meant anybody's seru cattle could mix with the improv It also meant more opportunity for rustlers and brand changers

The sheep-cattle controversy added to the need for cheap fencing. Sheep herders wanted fences to protect their flocks from the open range, and cattlemen wanted the sheep out of their way. Homesteaders, or "nesters," had use for neither and wanted only to protect their farms.

Smooth wire was no obstacle and wooden fences were too ex pensive; the cowman who built the first barbed drift fence to keep his cattle from straying too far from camp during winter storms little realized what he was starting, for it opened up the era when cattlemen and farmers fought each other with wire cutters and six-shooters. A law became effective that no cowman should carry pliers in his saddle

As cattlemen accepted it, barbed wire took over and revolutionized cattle ranching; by 1890, fences were being erected throughout the cattle country and the free range was little more than members opening three gates between their ranch home and Crowell. Wagon roads in those days wound their way across the country. The first gate, according to Mr. Ribble, was in King County, the second was near the end of the present Farm Road 2003 in the Good Creek community, and the third was near Dixie Mound in the Wishon Ranch.

When the cowboys left with the herd they opened one gate about a mile southeast of the cemetery; it was the last until they reached their destination, the Witherspoon Ranch, which is now part of the Halsell

The County Historical Survey Committee has on display a collection of barbed wire in the window at Shirley-Youree. Mrs. Virgil Johnson became interested in the different kinds of wire, and it is her collection that is being displayed. In submitting this article, Mrs. Johnson asked that people of Foard County notice the collection and add to it as other productions of barbed wire are
