Under the new system authorized by the 62nd Legislature during its 1971 regular session, Texas schools will be required to divide their 180-day school year into three quarters instead of two semesters. A school district may also operate a fourth quarter if it chooses, paying for the extra time out of local tuition charges or tax

Most Texas districts are expected to offer three quarters of instruction, at least during the first year. State funds allocated to districts under the Foundation School Program will cover only the usual 180 days of instruction plus 10 days for teacher inservice training.

Texas high schools (grades 9-12) will have two options in meeting accreditation standards. They may grant credit under the current semester unit plan but extend the instruction time spent daily or weekly in a course. "Members of our task force inwithin the Texas Education Agency. We have also met with school administrators and teachers at maformal gatherings in all sections of the state in order to get their viewpoints and suggestions for implementing the new plan.

"This foundation work has taken time, but we believe it will have more time and avoid a number of mistakes in the long run," Nix added.

Moving to the quarter system may have little effect on elementary schools, particularly in districts which operate only three quarters. Time for reporting to parents, however, may be adjusted to coincide with the secondary schools.

Districts which decide to offer a year-round four quarter system, with pupils rotated to attend three of the four districts, must adjust pupil and faculty assignments to make sure that families desiring a common vacation quarter will have that opportunity.

A sample three-quarter calendar outlined for the 1972-73 school year could begin on August 21, 1971, and run until May 31, 1973. The first quarter would run from August 21 to November 24, 1972, with seven days of teacher inservice training and three holidays. The second quarter would run from November 27 to March 2, 1973, with two inservice days and eight holidays. The third quarter would begin March 5 and end on May 31, with one teacher inservice day and three holidays.
