BALD-HEADED SOLONS.

Queer Things Seen from the Press Gallery of the Senate.

Statesmen Who Are Entitled to Seats in the Front Rows of Variety Theaters—A Rear View of Senators Blodgett and Hill.

[Special Washington Letter.]

Looking from the press gallery of the senate upon the members of that august body to-day during the discussion of an important bill, I was struck with the remarkable similarity in the appearance of Senator Hill, of New York, and Senator Blodgett, of New Jersey. The front seat in the senate gallery is about twenty feet higher than the desks of the senators, and the two distinguished gentlemen mentioned, who occupy chairs in the back row on the democratic side, were about fifty feet from me. Both of them were engaged in writing letters, and as they bent over their desks their smooth, bald heads were strikingly similar in size, shape, and I had almost said, alike in expression.

Two other bald heads, directly opposite, on the back row on the republican side of the chamber, were in striking contrast. Senator Carey, of Wyoming, and Senator Shoup, of Idaho, might readily be mistaken for each other if only the tops of their heads were photographed. Hill and Blodgett have long, narrow heads, while Carey and Shoup carry their brains in larger, rounder skulls which look much like elliptical billiard balls. In the house of representatives the gentlemen who have been honored with seats in that popular body are, in the main, very much younger than the potent, grave and reverend seigniors who deliberate in the senate. This is probably because the representatives are selected for two years, and frequent changes are thereby made; while senators are elected for six years and each of them generally has to grow old in the service.

Senator Harris, of Tennessee, has been in public life so long that, but for his bristling mustache, he would be entirely devoid of capillary ornamentation, and he has probably by this time forgotten how he used to look before nature deprived him of hair. Senator Allison, of Iowa, who has been a member of the senate for eighteen years, still retains a luxuriant suit of hair, and his face is almost entirely covered with a dark-brown beard which has been rapidly silvering during the recent months. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, has a complexion as florid and pink as that of a baby in long dresses, and the red corpuscles in his blood are so plentiful that his bald cranium is as well colored as his face. His colleague, Senator Davis, still wears a little shock of hair upon the apex of his cranium, and supplements the loss of top-knot with a short cropped, bristling beard which is rapidly becoming snow-white. Ex-Senator Ingalls was distinguished during his last six years in the senate by a most magnificent crop of silvery hair which seemed almost iridescent from the gallery distance. His successor, the celebrated Peffer, not only has a full suit of black hair, but a very handsome long, brown beard, which has been the subject of jests from the pencils of political scribblers. He is a very worthy and able man. Senator Wilson, of Iowa, who thirty years ago was the most vigorous debater in the house of representatives and a very athletic, handsome man, is to-day one of the quietest members of the senate, and to look upon his snow-white hair and beard he would not be recognized as the aggressive man of former days.

Senator Manderson, of Nebraska, who had a brilliant career as a soldier and who has been in public life for well-nigh forty years, still wears a full suit of dark brown hair, and with his fresh complexion, large mustache and small goatee looks not more than thirty years of age. Senator Butler, of South Carolina, a perfect Chesterfield upon the floor of the senate and probably the handsomest man on the democratic side of the chamber, has a rapidly thinning crown of silver and a bristling, snow-white mustache. With one well-made artificial more like the man we have known and liked for so many years. Senator Hansbrough, of South Dakota, looks more like Jack Haverly, the famous minstrel and theatrical manager, than any genuine member of Haverly's family could look. His hair is thick and glossy and his mustache large, strong and nearly the color which Titian loved to paint. He is one of the youngest men ever elected to the upper house of congress, and quite naturally chums with a brother senator nearly his own age.

Senator Dubois, of Idaho, served one term in the house of representatives with Hansbrough, and they were elected to the senate by their respective states at the same time. Their seats are contiguous, but it would make no difference to these senatorial friends if their seats were far apart, for they would get together every day, either upon the floor of the chamber or in the cloak room, and always lunch together in the senate restaurant. Senator Kyle, of South Dakota, is probably the tallest man in the senate to-day, and undoubtedly the youngest, being only thirty-seven years of age. He is not only tall but well proportioned, has a kindly face, and his education and training for the ministry are indicated constantly in his manner among his friends. Senator Gordon, of Georgia, who succeeded Mr. Brown, is no longer the vigorous and handsome man the older correspondents know when he left the senate ten years ago. His black hair is worn but little longer than the regulation cut, and his smooth-shaven cheeks lack somewhat of the ruddy glow of youth and health. Still he is a very active and valuable member of the senate. Senator Pugh, of Alabama, a large and almost portly man, has but few of his dark-brown locks remaining. Until Mr. White, of Louisiana, took his seat in the senate, Mr. Pugh wore the largest smooth-shaven face in that body.

Senator George, of Mississippi, is probably the most rugged character, physically, excepting Senator Cole, of Texas. Mr. George is not a very tall man, but has a well-knit, vigorous frame, and his hair and beard are stiff and wiry. Senator Cole, of Texas, is a tall, broad-shouldered man, with a snow-white beard. When he becomes in earnest and speaks as forcefully as he can, the senate walls and ceiling almost crack and crack again with the volume of sound. Senator Culom, of Illinois, would look very much like Abraham Lincoln if he were taller and more homely. His entire head and face and neck are covered with black hair, rapidly growing gray, but his upper lip is smooth-shaven. Anybody can see that Senator Pettigrew, of South Dakota, is a nervous man. His full beard and full suit of hair are very dark, but no kodak flash could photograph him, for he is constantly on the move, and so many demands are made upon him that he can seldom remain long in his seat at one time, because he is called to the marble-room, to the waiting-room, to the cloak-room or committee-room, to meet in conference friends and legislators on public business.

Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, looks like a tall sycamore of the Wabash, bowed and bended and silvered by the blasts and frosts of time. His strong voice and bright eyes, unaffected and undimmed by the flight of years, alone remain of the powerful physique of former days. The senior senator from Ohio looks no older than when I first saw him on the floor of the senate before he became secretary of the treasury. John Sherman is, in the judgment of the press gallery, the ablest statesman in all respects upon the floor of the senate. His colleague, Senator Brice, who sits upon the democratic side, is a short, well proportioned man with a face which is noted for its Semitic features. He has a heavy suit of fine, black hair and a heavy, coarse, wiry, red beard. He is a companionable gentleman among his friends, and generous to the poor. Senator Gorman, of Maryland, is as smooth physically as he is intellectually. He is the keenest politician of his party, and at the same time an experienced statesman. His sharp features and smooth shaven face; his hair, parted and smoothed like the locks of a hotel clerk, and his perfect fitting clothes make him a man who must attract attention wherever he goes.

THE CUP THAT CHEERS.

A new tea-pot has been invented in the interest of tea-drinkers. It is made of brown earthenware or of porcelain. There is no metal, not even silver, used in its make. The chief characteristic of this teapot is the porcelain "drip" of perforated ware which fits inside the teapot below the cover. The tea is placed in this "drip" and the boiling water is poured over it. By this means the tea leaves are prevented from sinking to the bottom and there is no possibility of danger of that deleterious element known as tannin being extracted from the tea. Where the tea lies in the bottom of the teapot for any length of time considerable tannin is taken up by the pure extract of tea.

While this teapot has everything to recommend it from a hygienic point of view, it is yet no novelty. The Chinese have used a teapot of this kind for centuries, and a tiny one of blue and white Owari ware may be purchased in any of the oriental shops as low as ten cents, with the porcelain "drip" and all fitted under the cover.

The slice of lemon which has displaced milk in the favor of many as an accompaniment of tea has in turn met a rival. It is vanilla. In many parts of Europe a small bit of vanilla is put into the pot with the tea, and hot water poured over both. The flavors are said to blend deliciously. There is still another way of obtaining the flavor, which is not likely to become popular because it does not allow for the passing of the fancy. When the tea or coffee service is being made vanilla flavor is added to the china in the potter's hands, and thus it is baked into every article of the set. Whenever afterwards the tea things get hot they exhale a faint aroma of vanilla.

"Is tea an acquired taste like sardines and olives?" asked Perry Edith, as the conversation flagged at a reception.

"Of course it is," answered Dorothy Spruce, whose family had come over with Penn. "The first tea ever sent into Pennsylvania was presented to my great-grandmother, who had it cooked and served just like spinach, two pounds, all at one time, seasoned with salt and pepper, and treated with a sauce composed of butter and eggs. No need to say they didn't eat it; otherwise I might not be here to tell the tale."—Chicago Times.

Life Is Worth Living.
Trying as its vicissitudes are, by those unweary by chronic disease. Mainly because Hostetter's Stomach Bitters fortifies the system against disease by promoting a vigorous performance of the functions of the system, it possesses a wide general utility. It promotes strength through improved digestion. This is the first, the most essential step. Subsequently the Bitters insures regularity of the bowels, liver and kidneys. Malaria, rheumatism and nervous trouble yield to it.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment.
