Nobody Loves Forever

By Margareta Brucker

XXXIII
A DOZEN times before the bus reached the hospital Jessica lost her courage. A dozen times she berated herself for a fool even to imagine that the girl who lay in the hospital, disfigured and unwilling to disclose her identity, could be Lucy. Even when she left the bus and crossed the street, with the wind whipping her skirts about her and tearing at her hair, she was uncertain. She was still uncertain when a little later she was ushered into a warm, brightly lighted office.

She guessed that she was not the only person who had visited the hospital with information. There had been others, the pretty nurse who conducted her, explained. So far nothing of value had been discovered. She sat and waited for 15 minutes by the round electric clock on the wall, giving every minute more tense.

Then a gray-haired woman sat opposite her and Jessica's confidence returned under the superintendent's kindly questioning. She listened intently as Jessica told the story of the ring.

She nodded encouragingly from time to time as Jessica described the pattern in which the stones were set and the inscription inside the ring corresponded with the ring the injured girl wore, she admitted.

Jessica's eager eyes were bent upon the superintendent's face. She told the story of the ring's sale and the name of the jeweler who bought it. Then she hesitated. Now came the most important fact of all, the one which would give a clue to the girl's identity. There must be a definite link between the purchaser of the ring and the unidentified girl who lay in a room in this same hospital.

The woman opposite noticed her hesitation. "Go on," she urged.

Jessica's dark eyes deepened as she said, "I know the man who wanted to buy the ring."

sister had gone away to work and would write to them shortly. But suppose the girl was Lucy?

SHE followed the woman from the office and down the long corridor to the elevator. A cold chill of apprehension swept over her as they left the elevator and her heels tapped down the long, echoing, hospital corridor. They paused in front of a door. A nurse slipped out.

The superintendent explained that she planned to visit the patient for a moment or two.

The door opened. They stood inside a room with one shaded lamp beside the high bed. The girl who lay there never moved.

The superintendent motioned to Jessica to follow her as she moved forward. Jessica could take in every detail: the slight figure concealed by the bedclothes, a bit of blond hair which showed beneath the bandage that covered practically her whole face, the closed eyes.

What would it mean to learn that this girl was Lucy? Trouble. Grief. Jessica took a step backward. The superintendent said firmly, "Speak to her. If you have anyone in mind, speak her name."

Jessica's lips were stiff and trembling. She came closer. She bent over the bed, and suddenly the tight lids flew open and just for an instant a pair of deepened gray-blue eyes looked deep into her own.

"Lucy!" She pushed past the superintendent's stout figure and stood so close that she could catch the hurried breath of the injured girl. "Lucy!" she cried despairingly.

The lids covered the betraying blue-gray eyes.

"Lucy!" She had her voice under control now. "Please—Tom's home, Lucy. He needs you."

There was a slight flicker of the eyelids. The superintendent said, "Come with me." She led Jessica into the hall outside. "I can't let you stay any longer," she said, "but we'll try to do what we can to persuade her to see you again. Call me this evening. I may have news for you."

U. S. Helping Brazil To Capitalize On Full Advantage Of Air Age

By Charles Corddry
WASHINGTON (UP)—Brazil, a vast country in which aviation holds peculiar advantages over ground transportation, is building a multi-million dollar air age education center.

The government believes the center will be unique among nations.

Situated about 40 miles from the modern and wealthy city of Sao Paulo in an eight-square-mile area, the aeronautical technical center will be staffed with outstanding United States Aviation figures from the fields of education, industry and government.

standing United States Aviation figures from the fields of education, industry and government.

The plan, as outlined in a United Press interview by Dr. Arthur Amorim, representing the center here, is to have four institutes which will educate promising students from Brazil and throughout the Americas. They will be taught all phases of aviation: research and development, aircraft design, aircraft engines, manufacturing, air transportation, airport engineering and administration, navigation and landing aids, military aeronautics, etc.

In no other place is there an institution like this one being developed with the aid of a corps of United States experts enlisted by the Brazilian air ministry.

The first institute, that for aeronautical technology, already is functioning in a small way. It is headed by Richard Smith, a former professor of aerodynamics at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Its aeronautical engineering school has been opened, under Dr. Theodore Theodorsen (formerly a noted scientist of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics).

Mrs. Webb and Mrs. Clark are daughters of Mrs. Johnson.
