Attorney General Being Groomed To "Resign"

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 (UP)—Evidence mounted today that attorney general J. Howard McGrath is being groomed for resignation.

Much of the evidence, indirect as it was, came from President

Truman himself, and his non-committal attitude toward McGrath's continuance as head of the Justice Department.

What appeared to be a White House chill toward McGrath started when the President fired T. Lamar Caudle as head of the Justice Department's tax division without even consulting McGrath.

Even after Caudle was rapped publicly by the President for "outside" activities and raked over the coals by a House Ways and Means subcommittee looking into tax scandals, McGrath still defended his former assistant.

Against this background, the President was asked yesterday at a news conference about a report that he had received written word from McGrath that the attorney general wanted to quit.

The President, speaking from a prepared memorandum, said he was not going to answer the question because there had been so many rumors that he could not possibly answer all of them.

He recalled that only the day before he had announced the reorganization of the Internal Revenue Bureau and said that when he was ready, he would make further announcements.

Educated guessing in White House circles was that among these further announcements would be word that McGrath was out as attorney general. This did not preclude some other assignment for McGrath, who served as chairman of the democratic national committee in 1948 when Mr. Truman won his spirited reelection battle.

The South Pole was discovered by Roald Amundsen 40 years ago, after a 55-day trek with dog sleds across the great ice shelf.

POTPOURI AND WORSE

By Major Hoopie McCorkle
Telegram Philosopher

Most of our troubles are imaginary, and this is a good thing, for if our troubles were real most of us would fall before the race in life begins. We worry merely to have something to do, and not because we have worries that need attention.

Probably one of the greatest of all worries is the "microbe worry". We tremble every time we hear "germ" mentioned. Now there is a difference between microbes and germs, but not enough to alarm a civilized world (if we are civilized, which we sometimes doubt), but these microbes as a rule would give us very little trouble if we would just leave them alone. Fact is we put in about half our time stirring them up, feeding them and picking a fight. We should win because they are very small and we are very large. As long as you keep them stuffed with vitamins and tonics they are going to live and get stronger. If you'll leave them alone they will get lonesome and lodge on some fellow who will feed them.

Women are worse than men to fume and fuss about germs, microbes, et cetera. We knew a woman once who decided to starve to death rather than eat filthy food. She was the most particular woman we ever met. If she ate bacon she had to come sliced and packed in a glass jar. Just ordinary sliced bacon wouldn't do. It never entered her feeble mind that bacon came from a hog and that nothing short of hell-fire and brimstone could clean up a hog. The hog is a very unclean animal and a little glass jar isn't going to purify him, even if he stays in it until he rots.

Another old hen wouldn't drink milk, said it was too filthy. In a way she may have been right. Milk can house more microbes, germs and bacteria to the square inch than any other liquid under the canopy of heaven, yet we do not consider milk a poison. One duck came along and gave us what is known as "pasteurized" milk. He didn't guarantee to kill all the germs, but did promise to cripple them until they couldn't kick your tonsils as they went down.

Many otherwise intelligent mothers fell for this pasteurized product and their children were instructed to pass up ordinary raw milk straight from the cow. When we think of this we wonder how on earth the human race kept building and growing. For nearly six thousand years babies and children, as well as adults, have been thriving on this bovine juice (cow milk), and if it has ever killed anybody we have neglected writing it up. We were raised on the stuff, and though we may have probably consumed several quadrillion germs (about as many as Truman owes dollars) they have never hurt us in the least. Fact is, we balance these scales at a little less than 200, and only for the signs, we would not know the difference between a hospital and haberdasher shop.

Those milk germs and microbes made a large animal out of us. We still think it is alright to strain sweet milk, just in case old

Fide did kick a handful of fertilizer in the bucket while we were off killing rats, but once the sand and gravel is removed why bother about pasteurization or homogenization. The milk is ok; germs or no germs, and we will take it straight, just like a Kentucky Colonel takes his bourbon. If it is pasteurized it means you will be drinking crippled germs, and if it is homogenized it means that they have been beaten to a pulp and won't even show up in the cream line.

Indians are just about as healthy as any other type of American germ catchers, but they are not nearly so hard to please when it comes to groceries. Up in Oklahoma we have seen Indians kill a beef and hang it upon a windmill tower to cure. In the summer time the meat cures out pretty rapidly, but as long as flies hang around they know the meat is good and it is consumed with relish. And the funny thing is it doesn't make 'em sick, much less kill them. In fact they are probably more healthy than we are, though we won't go far as to recommend some of their meat in it's last stages.

However, just for your information, no Indian wants you to feel sorry for him. They eat most of their meat raw, and so far as bread is concerned you had just as well quit making it. We used to live with the Indians—mostly Choctaws and Chickasaws, and they are really fine people.

A few of the young warriors (high school kids) try to fool people by their eats. They will go into a cafe and order sweet milk and French Apple or Boston cream pie, and figure strangers won't know they are Indians. They care nothing for the pie, and eat it just for a show. That night they will go home and eat jerked venison or maybe raw bull beef for supper, unless Chief Rain-In-The-Face has knocked over some wild game during the day. An Indian is not afraid of germs or microbes.

Down in Mexico many Mexicans in the "peon class" subsist largely on frijoles, tortilla and super-hot chili peppers. Their cooking is done largely in the open, and an old coffee can or lard bucket may be their only utensil. It is never washed for it don't need it. When it burns out they just hunt up another old can. All Mexicans smoke cigarettes, except that one got killed in a bull fight, and they seem to live about as long as the rest of us, despite dirty dishes, cans, hot pepper and cigarettes. They probably would live forever only for the cigarettes—they usually go to hurting them about the time they get to be 110 years old, germs and microbes, not withstanding.

When we were a kid we didn't apples—they would keep everybody away, and you'd get a free vaccination as well. And a good onion vaccination will make you immune against everything from ingrowing toe-nails to tuberculosis.

These anti-germ crusades are alright, we suppose, but in our day we imagine we have consumed food that we would be afraid to give our pup today. He is a city dog and is as scared of a germ as an old maid is a mouse. We still vaccinate ourselves with onions.

As we remember they had a few cases of yellow fever in those days, but we feel quite sure food and drink germs had nothing to do with it. In fact it didn't hit Texas, and if it had we would not have suffered very much as we were vaccinated. We did this vaccinating with onions. You remember the old rhyme "an apple a day will keep the doctor away." Well, onions are much better than

Woman Senator Struggles For Ban On Legalized Prostitution In Italy

By S. M. BOSSI
United Press Correspondent
ROME (UP)—Angelina Merlin, motherly-looking, white-haired left wing socialist senator, ropes to push through her bill outlawing legalized prostitution in Italy early next year.

The Merlin anti-prostitution bill was passed by the Italian senate Dec. 7, 1949, and has been pigeonholed since, awaiting action by the Chamber of Deputies.

"I'm still hopeful that at the beginning of next year the project will be approved in its entirety," the 71-year-old senator said in an interview.

She hopes to outlaw legalized prostitution—an institution here as far back as recorded history—and "make honest women" of the 40,000 house inmates and street-walkers registered with police.

Cities Given Quota
Prostitution is perfectly legal and is government-controlled in Italy.

Each city has its own quota of "Houses of Tolerance." There are 14 in Rome, where from two to 15 girls are in business from 2 p. m. to midnight. Off hour customers are also accommodated between 9 a. m. and noon. There are no

"all night" establishments. Streetwalkers are allowed to operate 24 hours a day. Senator Merlin described it as a "disgrace to womankind." Her project received the support of all political parties but today, two year after its presentation and passage in the Senate, prostitution is still wide open in Italy.

Blames Prejudices
Senator Merlin said "prejudices" were delaying action.

"Some still believe that the closing of the houses would be a danger because then there would be 'free' prostitution," she explained.

Asked if she thought that the outlawing of legalized prostitution in France had worked she answered affirmatively and predicted that government-licensed houses would never open again in that country.

She suggested that the wealthy proprietors of houses of prostitution in Italy were "working behind the scenes" in stalling the bill "but prejudices are mainly responsible for the delay."

Unemployment Insurance Still In Force—Payments Declining

Employers in Texas who come under the provisions of the state's unemployment insurance law have a good record of paying their payroll taxes. These taxes go into a fund that insures employees against the hazards of losing a job, the Texas Employment Commission reported today.

TEC said since the unemployment insurance program was first instituted in Texas back in 1935, and through November this year, some 80,359 employers have become liable for the payment of the unemployment tax. Actually, of the latter total only 32,083 employers are still in business and have active accounts. The remaining 48,276 employers have either gone out of business, reorganized or have terminated coverage under the unemployment insurance law when the number of workers in their employ was reduced below the eight that made them subject to the unemployment insurance law.

The agency further pointed out that of the 80,359 covered employers, approximately 4,500 still owe $1,707,168 in unemployment taxes. This amount represents only four-tenths of one per cent of the taxes reported for all periods since 1935. Many of these employers have died, others are dissolved corporations and still others have gone into bankruptcy.

TEC said that of the $1,707,168 outstanding balance, $1,193,483 is considered possibly collectible, and $513,705 probably can not be recovered.

TEC pointed out that after paying unemployment insurance to legitimately unemployed workers since 1938, and after reduction of unemployment tax rates, Texas still has some $246 million dollars in its trust fund.

Smooth Talking Texan In Jail After "Talks"

LINCOLN, Neb., Jan. 4 (UP).—A glib-tongued Texan was in jail here today having some trouble proving he could "sell anything to anybody"—in this case "anything" meaning a reason for his release.

The Texan was held on an open charge, while officers pondered his case.

They said he hired a cab from a local hotel and gave the driver his destination: Wahoo, Neb., where he said he would pick up his car.

The driver loaned him money on the way—for breakfast, his hotel bill, some clothes and three long distance phone calls. The driver called police at the end of his trip, worried about his loan of $40 and the cab fare due.

He hoped his passenger had had some luck on one of the telephone calls—the one to a finance company in Texas.

Leaves Home In Omaha, Nebraska

OMAHA, Neb., Jan. 4 (UP).—Red-haired Madelo Evans, who got a lot of publicity in Texas by passing a string of bad checks and impersonating a WAF officer, is missing again today, with her teen-age brother.

Frank Evans said his 27-year-old daughter apparently persuaded 15-year-old Raymond Evans to leave town with her after quitting his job, drawing the paycheck and withdrawing $50 from a bank account.

Evans and his wife had a card from Madelo, written from Kansas City, saying she and Raymond "would be back soon."

Evans said the daughter who drew probation after writing the bad checks in Texas probably would be using a false name on her current trip.

Tips On Growing African Violets

The African-violet, Saintpaulia, is by far America's most popular houseplant. Reasons are: (1) the long blooming period, (2) the fact that African-violets can be grown in east and north windows where many other plants won't respond, and (3) the ease with which you can increase them.

With so many newcomers to the art of growing African-violets, the January issue of Better Homes & Gardens magazine gives the following tips on some of the plant's more common ailments.

When the leaf stems of an African-violet become jellylike, your plant usually is getting too much water. Leaf stems resting on moist, porous clay pot rims also develop areas like jelly—due to contact with soil salts that collect on rims and soil surfaces.

To counteract this, you should let the soil surface dry between waterings and support softened foliage with paper collars. Cover the rims with wax or aluminum foil. Leaf troubles vary—drooping leaves mean too much or too little water, or gas in the air. Yellow leaves indicate too much sun, or red-spider mite. Drops of cold water make yellow spots or streaks.

If your African-violet crown rots, you are probably overwatering. Remove the crown, cut off rotted portions, and rest in a pot of vermiculite or medium-dry potting soil. Water sparingly until new roots form. The chemical Ferbam is a good preventive for crown rot due to fungus. Use one-half teaspoon to a quart of water as a spray.

When the buds drop off before opening, you have probably exposed the plant to a sudden temperature change. Watch this trouble in spring and fall when day and night temperatures are most variable. Too much feeding also can cause bud dropping.

When your African-violets refuse to bloom it may mean the soil lacks necessary food elements. The Better Homes & Gardens article suggests. You should water the plants once a month with a liquid plant food. The first month this should be done twice.

Soil Analysis Is The First Step To Better Crops And Pastures

This is a most important subject for all of us, even the high school boys and girls on the farm. We now know that depleted soils, lacking in proper minerals, can't produce the kind of grass and food suitable for man or beast. Animals, including men, must have important minerals, and he gets them either from foods containing these minerals, or in the form of vitamins from the drug store.

Have your soil analyzed, even the garden plot. Your A&M College has a new way, and simple way, of doing this. See your County Agent for the proper forms.

Looking Back on 1951—

... the inventory shows that the scales weighed out a good portion of the better things for us to enjoy. While the mistakes we made stick out like a sore finger and our failures almost overwhelm us, yet these discouragements are small indeed compared to the unhappiness and tragic experiences of some who happen to live in other countries. Spicy Sauce For Tasty Beef Party Serving

Here's a simple and savory recipe to add to your ground beef file—beef patties with spicy sauce. You brown plump patties first then add the spicy sauce that's served over the meat. This recipe is highly recommended by Reba Staggs, well-known meat expert and home economist.

- Beef Pattie—Spicy Sauce
1 pound ground beef
1 teaspoon salt
1-8 teaspoon pepper
1-4 cup catchup
2 tablespoons prepared mustard
1-8 teaspoon cloves

Combine meat, salt and pepper and shape into 4 patties, 3-4 to 1 inch thick. Brown patties on both sides in frying-pan. Mix catchup, mustard and cloves. Pour mixture over patties and cook about 8 to 10 minutes, turning occasionally. Serve sauce over patties; 4 servings.
