CHAFFEE'S HEROISM.

One Day's Work that Brought Him Promotion.

One of the chapters of General Chaffee's diary deals with the fight of the Big Dry Wash in the summer of 1882, cherished by cavalrymen as one of the gallant ones of their arm of the service. About 150 White mountain Apaches who had taken to the warpath were on one side of a canyon in the Mogollon plateau. Chaffee, a major, with a pursuing troop of the Sixth cavalry, held the summit of a rocky hill commanding the entrance to the canyon. The battle went on for Lours. One of the scouts fell some twoscore yards from where Chaffee was standing. A second scout, at Chaffee's elbow, remarked that the fallen man was done for, but the major saw that he was only wound-

"Come along," said he, "and we'll fetch him in.'

Then he threw himself flat on the ground and crawled toward the wounded soldier. The scout followed. Slowly and painfully Chaffee and his companion, in the face of a concentrated fire from all the Indians, worked their way to the wounded man and half carried and half dragged him back within the the rock, thrilled with the deed that had been performed, forgot the task in hand, stopped fighting and began to cheer. This made Chaffee furious, and he shouted at the top of his voice:

"Shut up that noise and go shootturned their attention to their carbines and, relieved in the nick of time by two troops of the Third cavalry, slowly they fought the foe to a standstill. The Apaches, almost to a man, were killed or captured.
