Guam Action Means Strength, Not Weakness By WILLIS THORNTON.

The action of the House in rejecting the $5,000,000 project to begin fortifying Guam will undoubtedly draw interested comment abroad.

It will be said that this was a great rebuke to President Roosevelt, and it will be suggested that the American people are plainly divided on armament plans.

Neither deduction will be justified. True, rejection of the Guam proposal is to some extent a rebuke to President Roosevelt and one particular item of his plans for national defense. But it is not a grave rebuke. For the House almost unanimously went right on to pass appropriations 10 times as great for other items of Pacific de-

The question was not "Shall we resolutely provide defense measures proportionate to the increasing armament of the world about us?" It was simply a question of "How best provide that defense?" To decide deliberately on defense means and policies that accompany them, and not to be stampeded into hasty action, is a mark of strength, not weakness.

The House decided that to begin fortifying Guam was not the best way. On defense itself, practically the entire country is united as it has been on few things in recent years. Let no foreign commentator make any mistake about that.

These reasons undoubtedly ruled in the mind of the House majority in rejecting the Guam proposals:

First, it would certainly be annoying or alarming to Japan, precisely as we would be alarmed if Japan began fortifying the island between San Francisco and Hawaii, or Britain turned Bermuda into another Singapore. Such action, in a world where countries are spending half their time annoying or alarming others, ought not to be taken unless vital to defense.

Second, it wasn't considered vital to defense of the United States.

And third, if Guam were to be fortified at all, it should be fortified in such a way that it could be defended. The proposed plan merely made it a more desirable if not-if the agent finds a de- great the voice of experience whisplum for Japan or anyone else to pick at any time it pleased ficiency in the tax and the tax- pers in his ear.

Those are all sensible and reasonable reasons for the and another attempt to reach an manure should be used in a rose bed House action. But no one should draw from it the con- agreement is made. clusion that the United States is unwilling to provide such defenses as seem to it necessary to make itself and its interests safe.

On this general theme, the country grows more united daily as it becomes more and more clear that the rest of the world is determined to chuck orderly procedure out the window and resort only to the tactics of the alley bully and the Neanderthal Man.
