"THE SECRET OF THE SUBMARINE"

Great Serial by Alexander Powell Now Being Run at Airdome Theater--The First Four Episodes in this Issue

Mr. J. R. Saucier of the Airdome Theater has made arrangements to have the serial, "The Secret of the Submarine," published weekly in the ADVANCE as the episodes are shown at the theater. The first four episodes of the story are published in this issue in order that the reader may catch up with the picture, the fourth episode of which will be run next Tuesday night.

"The Secret of the Submarine" is along preparedness lines and strikes the keynote of real Americanism. It is a story woven around the life of a young girl whose father is the inventor of an apparatus enabling sub-sea craft to reach great depth without danger to the crews. The formula of this invention is sought by foreign governments as well as by the American government, introducing the question of national defense in both a logical and thrilling manner. The theme of the story is taken from the idea attributed to Thomas A. Edison to have submarines take their air supply direct from the water as fish do through their gills. There is rapid fire action from beginning to end and a mystery that every reader will want to solve.

Religious Notice

During August the Sunday School and Church service hour will be merged in one. Everyone is invited to attend.

Bishop Johnston especially hopes that the parents will come with their children so all may worship together. Hour of Service, 9:30 a. m.; this will be the only service held in the church during August.

Will We Own This Sea-Power Secret?
Thomas A. Edison, Chairman of the National Defense Board, is credited with following statement:

"To my mind there is no reason why an undersea boat should not be supplied with a fish-gill-like apparatus so that it can draw its supply of air directly from the water. Thus the lives of the crew will not be dependent upon the compressed air supply or on the ability of the boat to reach the surface. When this invention is perfected submarine navigation will be perfectly safe and secretive."

This American super-submarine can strike even greater consternation among foreign navies than did Ericsson's Monitor fifty-four years ago! Will the U. S. again revolutionize naval warfare?

COST OF PRINTING CONTINUES TO SOAR

Printers and Publishers Forced to Raise Prices or Go Out of Business--Worst Yet to Come

The increase in the cost of everything which goes into the making of a newspaper has made an increase in the advertising rates of nearly all country papers imperative. And all papers which have subsisted on a $1.00 subscription price are, most of them, raising the price to $1.50, and some to $2.00.

The Glenwood, Ill., Herald comments thus upon the situation: "Type has advanced 25 per cent; printer's furniture 25 per cent; inks from 40 to 1000 per cent; print papers, from 30 to 60 per cent; envelopes, card boards and flat bond papers, from 35 to 65 per cent, etc."

"No one expects to purchase any commodity at less than the cost of manufacturing. All other finished products have gone up to cover the advance in raw material and cost of production, but most of the printers have struggled along, hoping time would bring a change, until necessity compels us to do the business-like thing--raise our prices."

"The living expenses of the printer's family have advanced, just the same as with other folks, while we have continued to sell the product of our labor at the old prices."

And the worst is yet to come, for the manufacturers tell us the scarcity of raw material and increased cost of labor is going to force prices higher and higher.

New Bridge at Comfort.

The money has been raised and popular subscription and the contract let for a first class concrete wagon and automobile bridge over the Guadalupe river at Comfort. This will be good news to the traveling public and will relieve the travel of one great obstacle in the trip by auto from this section to San Antonio. The enterprising people of our neighbor town are to be congratulated.

FIRST INSTALLMENT

In a room of the huge building in Washington which houses the state, war and navy departments, half a dozen men sat about a long mahogany table. Though they were in civilian dress, the fashion in which they wore their clothes and the earnestness of their carriage stamped them unmistakably as men who were more at ease in uniform than in the garb of civil life.

"I have here, gentlemen," announced the chairman, selecting a letter from a pile of correspondence which lay before him, "an interesting communication. It is from Dr. Ralph Burke, the California inventor—the same man, you may remember, who suggested the improvement on the Japanese shimosa powder and who perfected the condensation system which the navy is now using."

"Isn't he the same man, admiral," interrupted one of the officers, "who purchased the hull of that old submarine at Mare Island which was condemned two or three years ago? Bought it for experimental purposes, didn't he?"

"Exactly," was the answer. "For a number of years now Burke has been carrying on experiments in the hope of devising a system for producing oxygen from water for use in submarines. It is scarcely necessary for me to point out to you, gentlemen, that were a submarine able to draw its supply of air directly from the water, the lives of the crew would no longer depend upon the supply of compressed air or upon the boat's ability to reach the surface. Doctor Burke now writes to the secretary that he has at last succeeded in perfecting a system which is both practical and simple. He asserts that it can be installed in any submarine and that one thus equipped can remain below the surface indefinitely—for a month if necessary."

"Good heavens, admiral," exclaimed a puzzled officer, his professional enthusiasm overcoming his habitual reserve, "if this man Burke can do what he claims he will revolutionize naval warfare. Why not send an officer out to the coast at once to examine it?"

"Jarvis Hope is the man to send," said the chairman. "Son of old Commodore Hope, who lost his life in the hurricane at Samon, you remember. There isn't a brighter youngster in the bureau of construction. He's as good a chemist as we have in the service and he's made a special study of submarine problems."

A moment later the door opened and Lieutenant Jarvis Hope, clicking his heels smartly together, stood rigidly at attention.

"Mr. Hope," said the chairman kindly, "How would you like to take a little run out to the coast? I believe that you are already familiar with this letter from Doctor Burke. The members of the board are of the opinion that you should start immediately for California, examine Burke's invention, give it an exhaustive test, and, if you are convinced that it is practical, obtain an option on it. Bear

The Two Locked Forms Swayed Madly About the Little Cabin.

In mind, Mr. Hope, that if this invention can do what Burke claims for it, it will give to the nation which holds the secret, control of the seas—and the day is coming when our national existence may depend upon our possessing such a secret."

When, six days later, the accommodation train, which meets the Overland Limited at Sutsun Junction, came chugging into Valdivia, Jarvis Hope swung on to the station platform and tossed his bags to the driver of the bus of the local hotel.

After a bath, a shave, and a leisurely luncheon, Hope set out on foot for the cottage occupied by Doctor Burke.

As he was striding briskly past a line of stores, barber shops, saloons and pool rooms, which comprise Valdivia's business district, he felt a hand fall suddenly on his shoulder, while a hoarse voice boomed:

"Avast there, Mr. Hope. Stand by a minute and pass the time of day with an old shipmate, won't ye?"

The young officer whirled about to confront a figure so quaint, so picturesque, so redolent of the sea that he might well have stepped from the pages of "Treasure Island." The man was of such tremendous girth that he looked shorter than he really was. Protruding from his right coat sleeve, where his hand should have been, was a crudely fashioned iron hook. For a moment, Hope stared at him coldly, then the light of recognition came over his face.

"Hook Barnacle, as I'm alive," he exclaimed, grasping the old sea-dog's single hand. "Why, Hook, I haven't seen or heard of you since you got your discharge from the old Decatur back in '99. You've grown so fat since those days that I didn't know you at first."

"You could get as fat as a jellyfish, Mr. Hope, sir, and I'd know you anywhere. It's going on seventeen years since you jumped overboard in Pago-Pago harbor, and yanked me out of the jaws of that shark, but I remember it as clear as if it happened yesterday. And what brings you out to the coast, if I might make so bold's to ask, sir?"

"I've been detailed to see a man named Burke—Dr. Ralph Burke—an inventor. He lives here in Valdivia. Ever hear of him?"

"Hear of Doctor Burke? Chucked the sailor. Why, Lord love you, sir, I've been doing odd jobs for the doctor ever since he and his daughter came here to live. And when he heard that I used to be in the navy he gave me charge of putting the engine in that old submarine hull he bought a while back. By the jumping Jehosophat, I'll bet that's what brings you to Valdivia, lieutenant—to get the secret of the submarine!"

"Hook," laughed the officer, "your deductions would do credit to Sherlock Holmes. I've come out to have a look into Doctor Burke's invention. Now suppose you show me where he lives."

At the very edge of the town, where the street became a country road, stood a weather-beaten two-story frame house. As Hook swung open the creaking gate a young girl suddenly darted around the corner of the house and then, catching sight of Hope, stopped dead, like a startled fawn. She was a very beautiful girl indeed; straight and slender as a boy, with a skin like creamy satin and a great crown of ruddy hair which turned to molten gold when the sun struck upon it. So lovely was she that Hope stood staring at her; stared until a rosy wave of confusion swept over her from brow to bosom.

"Miss Cleo, permit me to introduce Lieutenant Hope," said Hook. "Lieutenant, this is Miss Cleo Burke, Doctor Burke's daughter. You've heard me tell o' how he saved my life in Pago-Pago."

"Not the Mr. Hope who dove into the harbor and saved you from the shark?" she exclaimed breathlessly, open admiration in her eyes. "Hook has told us that story a hundred times. Mr. Hope. Why, it was quite the bravest thing I have ever heard of."

"Believe me, Miss Burke," said Hope, embarrassed in his turn, "I did nothing that any man would not have done in my place. Hook greatly overrates my services to him. It would never do to let as good a seaman as Hook become breakfast food for fishes."

"You—you haven't come to see my father's invention, have you? You haven't come in answer to his letter to the secretary of the navy?"

"That is precisely why I have come, Miss Burke," said Hope. "In order to see if I have traveled three thousand miles."

"Oh, Mr. Hope," she said anxiously, "I pray with all my heart that the government will take it. It has been my father's life work. Its acceptance will mean so very much to him—to me—to both of us. It would be a dream come true. I'll tell him that you are here."

The room into which she led Hope was stacked from floor to ceiling with books. As he was idly turning over the pages of a treatise on chemistry the door opened to admit Doctor Burke. The inventor was a small, wiry, nervous man, whose quick, excitable features plainly showed the strain under which he had been working.

"You are very welcome, Mr. Hope," said the old man, peering at his visitor through a huge pair of horn-rimmed spectacles.

"I am thoroughly familiar with the theory of your discovery, doctor," said Hope. "My instructions from the department are to witness a practical demonstration and to apply the customary tests. If it can pass those tests, I think there is but little doubt that the government will take steps to acquire it."

"It will pass any tests that you may impose, Mr. Hope," declared the inventor. "I did not communicate with Washington until I was positive that there was no chance for failure. The purchase of my discovery by the government means more to me than you perhaps imagine. It means comfort for me, Mr. Hope, in my declining years; it means leisure in which to conduct research work; it means food and clothes and education for my daughter Cleo."

"What did you do for workmen?" inquired Hope interestedly. "Where did you find men who had sufficient engineering knowledge?"

"In that respect I have been fortunate," was the answer. "My chief assistant, and the one on whom I have placed the most reliance, is a one-armed man-o'-war named Barnacle—the same, in fact, who brought you here. Then I have a young Japanese named Satsuma. He came to me and asked for work and he has proved of a great assistance. Like so many of his race, he is an extremely clever mechanic."

"A Japanese, you say?" said Hope quickly. "Isn't it a little unwise to let a foreigner become familiar with the details of your invention?"

"I fancy that Satsuma is quite harmless," said the inventor lightly, "but I have nevertheless made certain that he has had no opportunity to observe the workings of my invention. In fact, even were he able to obtain a drawing of the apparatus it would be quite useless to him unless he could also obtain the formula—and that is well guarded."

"I trust," said Hope gravely, "that you will continue to keep it well guarded. There is more than one foreign government that would pay handsomely for your secret."

"That I have already learned," said Doctor Burke. "Curiously enough, I was approached only yesterday by a man named Mahlin, who represented himself as the agent of a foreign government, though which one he refused to say. He did say, however, that if I would give him a demonstration of my discovery and it stood certain tests that he was authorized to purchase it on my own terms."

"And you refused?"

"I did," was the answer, "and God knows, Mr. Hope, I need the money. You are not aware, perhaps, that I

It was dated Washington. "Dear Montgomery," it ran: "Through a friend who is employed in a confidential capacity in one of the government departments, I have just learned something that may be of interest to you. An elderly chemist named Dr. Ralph Burke, living at Valdivia, Cal., has perfected an apparatus which will enable a submarine to remain under water indefinitely. I have not been able to learn the details of Burke's invention, but I understand that the navy department is so interested that a naval instructor, Lieut. Jarvis Hope, has been sent to the coast to examine it. Hope left Washington three days ago, so, if the matter interests you, quick action will be necessary. With best wishes, sincerely yours, Whitman Davis."

"Ralph Burke," said Montgomery reminiscingly, evidently putting his thoughts into words. "It's close on fifteen years since I've seen him—why, little Cleo must be almost a woman now. I wonder if she looks like her mother." Stepping across to a small safe, set in the wall, he gave the combination a few rapid turns and the steel door swung open. Opening one of the drawers, Montgomery drew out a large, square envelope of blue linen.

"I wonder if I did right by Cleo, he mused aloud, staring at the envelope with unseeing eyes. So lost was he in meditation that he was quite oblivious to the fact that the door leading to the outer office had opened and that a young man, his footfalls deadened by the thickness of the carpet, had entered and stood beside him.

"Who's Cleo, Uncle Calvin?" he exclaimed.

"I didn't hear you come in. I must have been talking to myself," he added, apologetically. Restoring the sealed envelope to the drawer from which he had taken it, he swung shut the door of the safe but failed to lock it. Returning to his desk, he picked up the letter from Washington.

"Here's a letter, Gerald, which I have just received from Davis—the man who keeps me informed of what is going on in Washington, you know. Just glance over it, will you, while I get a glass of water. I'm feeling a little dizzy."

The door had no sooner closed behind his uncle than Gerald Morton darted silently across the room, swung open the door of the safe, and snatched out the blue envelope. "Not to be opened until my death," Calvin Montgomery," he read aloud. "Now I wonder what the devil is in that?" he muttered, examining the seals.

Under the Weight of Water the Submarine Was Going Down.

too, was once in the service of the United States. As a young man I was with Farragut at New Orleans—I still carry in my shoulder a fragment of a Confederate shell—and I helped Ericsson to build the Monitor. So, even though it entails a financial sacrifice, I want my own country to have the first chance at my invention."

"That sentiment certainly does you credit, sir," said Hope. "I trust, both for your sake and for the country's that your ambition may be realized. Now the question is, when can I have a demonstration under sea conditions?"

"Tomorrow morning," was the prompt answer.

"Admirable," said Hope. "I shall be ready—and expectant. And please tell your daughter that I anticipate the pleasure of seeing her again before I return to Washington."

"You will see Cleo in the morning," said the inventor. "She has made me promise to take her along on the trial trip of the submarine, and I couldn't well refuse. She is as vitally interested in the success of the invention as I am."

Had one stepped from the elevator of the Flatiron building in New York, at the sixteenth floor, he would have found himself facing a door bearing, in neat lettering, the words: "International Supply company, Calvin Montgomery, Pres." If the ruler of a black republic wanted to pick up a gunboat or a destroyer at a bargain, he set an agent to Calvin Montgomery. He made it his business to keep informed of everything pertaining to warfare on land or sea, and he let it be known that he paid liberally for such information. Information of this sort was contained in the letter which he was reading with such absorption.

"You Have Convinced Me Absolutely of the Efficiency of Your Invention."

Satsuma in front of that empty house on the beach. They was a whispering together, and the minute they saw me they went inside. Perhaps the Jap's got another berth."

"No matter," said the inventor impatiently, "we can get along without him. If everything is ready we will go aboard."

"I have not confined my efforts entirely to my oxygen-producing system," remarked Burke, as he followed his guest through the circular manhole in the deck which gave access to the boat's interior. "I have utilized my spare moments in perfecting one or two other devices for use on submarines which may also interest you. This arrangement for automatically opening and closing the hatchway is one of them." As he spoke he indicated a lever connected with steel rods which ran up to the hinged cover of the hatch through which they had just descended.

"Very interesting, doctor," assented Hope, again becoming the trained naval officer, quick, intelligent, alert. "Very interesting indeed. But it is your oxygen apparatus that interests me most."

"This way, then," said Burke, opening the door which gave access to the after compartment of the submarine.

Had Hope and Cleo been less engrossed in Doctor Burke's explanation of his apparatus, they would have been startled by the peculiar behavior of the cushioned top of the locker which was built against the side of the room. Apparently of its own volition, the hinged top of the locker began to slowly rise, so imperceptibly at the first that one might have attributed it to the motion of the boat; then higher, still higher, until through the narrow opening thus formed appeared a human face—a yellow face, with slanting, cruel eyes.

"Are we submerged yet?" asked Cleo. Her question was answered by Hook, who at that moment entered from the navigating compartment.

"We have begun to submerge, sir," he reported, saluting.

"Very good," said the inventor briefly. "Tell the navigator to keep her at fifty feet until further orders."

A moment later the cover of the locker was suddenly thrown up and from the coffinlike space beneath slipped the missing Japanese, Satsuma. It was obvious that this man was no stranger to the higher forms of science and that he understood, in principle, at least, what each of the switches, dials and wires composing Burke's apparatus was for. But it was evident that the governing principle, for which this complicated mechanism was but a medium, eluded him.

For six hours the submarine had been under water. The air, its oxygen drained by a dozen pairs of lungs, had gradually become so vitiated that the breathing of all on board had become labored and difficult.

"Isn't it about time to demonstrate your invention, doctor?" asked Hope. "It's getting pretty close in here."

"Not yet," said Burke, who was seated at the little table in the forward compartment immersed in an abstruse calculation. "There's no hurry. You haven't said much, lieutenant, but I know that you're skeptical. I wish to wait until I can make my demonstration so convincing that you will have no skepticism left."

Twenty minutes later Hook entered. "Don't you think you'd better give us a little air, doctor?" he inquired anxiously. "The boys in the engine room are complaining that they can't breathe."

"Not yet," said the inventor, absently. "Tell them not to worry."

"Look here, Burke," gasped Hope, roughly, staggering across the room, "this nonsense has gone quite long enough. Look at your daughter there—the poor child is suffocating. If you don't set your apparatus to work, we'll die. I'll take command myself, rise to the surface, and telegraph to Washington that your invention is a fake and that you're a fraud."

"Mr. Hope," said the inventor, "I'm going to make you re-

Within three minutes after Burke had returned to the forward compartment, a subtle suggestion of freshness stole through the submarine; in five minutes the atmosphere was as fresh and wholesome as though they were in the open air.

"I apologize from the bottom of my heart, doctor," said Hope, seizing the old inventor's hand. "For what I said a few moments ago. You have convinced me absolutely of the efficiency of your invention, though you nearly suffocated us at first. It is scarcely necessary for me to say that I shall wire to the department tonight, strongly urging that it be purchased by the government."

"Thank you, Mr. Hope," said the inventor, huskily, a suspicious moisture in his eyes. "It looks as though my struggles were at an end."

Entering the rear compartment a moment later, Burke stood transfixed with utter astonishment. For at the switchboard, his hand on one of the switches which controlled the air current, stood Satsuma.

"What the devil are you doing here, Satsuma?" shouted the inventor wrathfully. "What have you just done to that machine?"

As Burke, carried away with anger, advanced menacingly, Satsuma's hand went toward his hip pocket. Burke, realizing the significance of the movement, instantly grappled with him. With a sudden twist, Satsuma threw Burke, the old man falling heavily. At that moment, Hope launched himself against the Japanese as, in his Annapolis days, he had tackled the West Point quarterback. For a few brief moments the two locked forms swayed madly about the little cabin, overturning the table and chairs and threatening each instant to wreck the mechanism of Burke's invention. Gradually working his right hand free, Satsuma succeeded in reaching his hip pocket. His fingers closed about the stock of an automatic. There was a deafening explosion, followed almost instantly by a shower of sparks from the nest of wires above the oxygen-producing apparatus. The stream of bubbles in the tank abruptly ceased and the little compartment was filled with acrid fumes.

"My God," groaned Burke, crouching on the floor where he had been thrown. "He's smashed the transformer!" The bullet which had been intended for Hope had missed him by a hair's breadth and had buried itself amid the mechanism. At the same instant Satsuma, like all Japanese, an adept in the art of wrestling, slipped from the officer's grasp and leaped through the door of the navigating room. A seaman attempted to fell him with a spanner, but the Oriental's pistol cracked sharply and the man, spinning completely around, crumpled in a heap. Another man who rushed forward fell with a bullet through his shoulder. Keeping the remainder of the crew covered with smoking pistols, Satsuma threw a handle which controlled the next and the floor showed the beginning to rise. LOCK

THE KERRVILLE ADVANCE

Published Every Thursday at Kerrville, Texas, by T. A. Buckner.

SUBSCRIPTION $1.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE

Entered as second class matter at the postoffice at Kerrville, Texas.

NEXT week is Fair week in Kerrville. We hope the Fair may have a successful exhibition this year. It is an institution calculated to be of great benefit to Kerrville and this entire section and ought to have the support of every patriotic citizen in all its good features. As an institution it has our endorsement, but we have seen fit to criticize its management in some particulars and if conditions are not changed we expect to continue to criticize more vigorously.

The Dallas Fair will run this year without the usual saloon as a revenue producer. This one feature is giving the fair more good, wholesome advertising than anything it has done since race track gambling was prohibited. By a vote of the people of Dallas the saloon was put out of the grounds.

AN irate patron of a restaurant called a waiter to him and said: "I found a needle in this soup; what does it mean?" "Beg pardon," said the waiter, who used to be a proof-reader. "That is a typographical error; it should have been a noodle."

Some fellow said it is the cost of high living that is most seriously affecting the prosperity of this country. It may be, but we belong to a profession that is not calculated to know.

GET the clean-up habit. It will do you good and do the town good.

Nyal's Remedies, the best there is. Guaranteed by the Kerrville Drug Co.

For Sale--40 acre farm 12 miles N. W. of Kerrville on the river, 30 acres in cultivation. Pecan grove and subject to irrigation. Price $2500. Apply at this office.
