planter you have been looking for. It is a new Avery product that will give you a new idea of how fine, easy and dependably the truly modern combination planter works.

The New Avery Twin-Drive Planter is as light of weight and draft as the average corn planter. Yet it is so sturdily built and so scientifically designed that it does the more exacting work of cotton planting with a perfection you would not believe possible for so light a machine.

A notable feature of this planter's design is the individual chain drive drive combination planters.

Here is the twin-drive corn and cotton for each hopper-an important improvement over the single sprocket drive which wears unevenly and throws the planter out of balance.

By KATE EDMONDS 444444444444444444444

"How can a fellow marry a girl when she won't even notice him?" demanded Arthur Digby of his assembled friends at the clubhouse. Some of them laughed understandingly while the others nodded sympa-

"Has anyone in particular asked that you marry the only girl you have in mind?" inquired Homer Clark,

"Don't be an ass," jerked out Arthur. "But I was merely wondering if any of you boys have been in the same fix?'

The four of them who had known Arthur Digby from boyhood smiled with him, and then Burt Raymond suggested: "If I really fell in love with a girl who appeared to dislike me, why I think I would give her a good heavy dose of feeling how it is to be disliked-eh, what?"

He subsided amid murmurs of approval, and Arthur grinned at him in very friendly way. "Thank you, Burtle-I'll follow your advice."

It was another day and Arthur Dig by was breaking his rule and going to an afternoon tea at the Goodwins. When he entered the drawing room he talked first to Mrs. Goodwin, with whom he was a great favorite. "Have you seen Bee?" she inquired after awhile. "She is pouring tea over in that corner." So Arthur presently wandered over in that direction, and when he saw that Beatrice was quite alone, he went up to her.

"How do you do, Miss Goodwin," he said coolly.

"Awfully warm, isn't it?" she said rather casually, looking past him. "Tea? How many lumps?"

"Nothing at all, thank you." And he went away as if drinking tea and eating small cakes was a very boresome thing, indeed. But when he saw Patricia Deering sitting in a corner by herself, looking rather bored but preeminently charming in her remote loveliness, he went to her and bowed low. "Your royal highness, a poor wandering knight feels dull and bored. Will your graciousness permit him to bask for a space?"

She scanned him with amused blue eyes and yet, behind that blue gaze one might have noticed sudden pain and a great hurt. It was with a sudden catch of the breath that she laughed softly. "Rest awhile, Sir Knight, in the same place beside me where you used to linger in days gone by!" Then her eyes were veiled by the unusually long, thick fringes of her eyelashes. Perhaps she could see the dark color fly to his cheeks and even to his forehead, but she might not have noticed a startled flash in her. Digby had deserted Patricia's undoubted charm for the glitter of dark Beatrice, and now Bee had whimsically been playing cruelly with him. When a man of his age-twenty-seven-courted a girl, his intentions were usually serious enough, but Bee was almost ten years his junior and was probably still dreaming! As for Patsy Deering he felt the old-time comfort in her companionship, and although she made no effort to hold him or to attract, he was boyishly hoping that she would invite him to come out to the old Deering place as he used to do.

"Why so deep in thought, poor Sir

Knight?" asked Patricia. "Oh-I was thinking-I am sure you wouldn't mind that, Patsy," but his tone was startled-apologetic.

"Think away, Arthur," she murmured gathering herself together to arise-it was hard to leave him now, just when he had come to her for comfort-but their world must not know how eager she was to grasp at this lost lover. "I must go on to the Cameron's tea."

"Will you give me a lift?" he asked with the old engerness, and when she nodded carelessly, her heart beat faster, as they moved toward Mrs. Goodwin to say farewell.

"Aren't you going to stay and have some tennis with Bee?" inquired Mrs. Goodwin.

Arthur glanced over to where Beatrice was surrounded by a number of lads of her own age. She was looking at him, then, and her fine line of black eyebrows lifted, but her accompany ing smile was inviting.

He smiled and nodded at Beatrice, but followed Patricia Deering down to her car. Would he have been interested if he had known that with his departure Beatrice's gayety departed and that her dark face grew cold and wistful? "It does seem good to me to see you two together again," whispered blithe Mrs. Cameron to first one and then the other of her old favorites, Patricia Deering and Arthur Digby, and it was with a peculiarly boyish appreciation that he received Patricia's carelessly spoken invitation. "Come out some time, Arthur. You know the way!"

And Arthur Digby suddenly found himself inbued with the old vigor and desire for lovely Patricia, and all at once discovered that he had loved her all the time more than any other girl in the world, and that his running after Beatrice Goodwin had been merely the fluttering of the moth for passing flame.

So that when Patricia and Arthur were married, they were destined to be happy ever after.
