new responsibility has been placed upon us. We have been given voice in the government of our county, state, and nation. This was not done through chivalry, courtesy, nor to pay us a compliment. The right to vote has been given to us because it is believed that we will be a great factor for good, clean government. There has never been a time in the history of this nation when true patriotic citizens were needed as they are now needed. Every woman in this county has shown herself a patriot to the nation during the last year. You have done hard work, and made many sacrifices to meet the calls of your nation. I beg of you to be as true to your state. Do not be indifferent to wour duties as a voter. Do he is obliged to drill each county recent to "our duties as a voter. ### APPLE BLOSSOMS

By EARL READ SILVERS.

The scent of apple blossoms pervaded the orchard, bringing to Anna Smith poignant memories of a late afternoon three years ago when, in that very orchard, Edgar Gillam had said his last good-by.

She and Edgar had grown up together. Living on adjacent farms, it had only been natural that Edgar should drop over of an evening to sit on the broad porch of the Smith residence.

.The Gillam farm was one of the most prosperous in that section of the state; the Gillams themselves were all that could be desired socially, and Edgar, as the ealy son and heir, was much sought after by the girls of the village. He was a tall, upstanding young man, with light, curly hair which invited stray fingers, and blue eyes which looked at one with a fearless frankness which was almost disconcerting.

But there had been a deep hurt in those eyes when he had said goodby to Anna. The day had started off much as other days, but at noon Ned Howell had phoned over from the village and had asked Anna if she would go auto riding with him that afternoon. And Anna, rather flattered by the invitation, had accepted. Ned had been East to college for three years and was spending his first vacation in able morsel. I looked round, and his his home town.

Anna had first met him after prayermeeting. He had come in the car evidently in search of amusement, and had asked if he might see her home. Edgar, she knew, was waiting at the door, as he had done for the past two years, but she had nodded a happy acceptance to Ned's invitation, and passed Edgar with the barest smile. Ned had taken her home in the car, but they hadn't gone directly to her "We'll take a little spin," he had said. "It's much too early to go home

And so they had rolled around the country roads while Ned told her of the life at college, of dances, football games and week-end house parties.

"Perhaps you might be able to come East to one of the dances," he had remarked just before he left her. "I would be pleased to have you come, you know."

She had been flattered, immensely flattered, at the implied invitation, and when be suggested that they take another ride the next evening, she had seadily consented. In the afternoon she had gone to the orchard to think about it all. And then Edgar had come. He stood before her as she sat on the bench.

"What time did you get in last night?" he had asked. "Before twelve," she answered.

"Why?" "Were you out riding with Ned Howell all that time?"

Ton't you know," he said, calmly, "that Ned has changed a lot since he

"Of course, he has; he's a college

"I didn't mean that."

"What did you mean?" I meant that he fell in with the wrong kind of men at college; that he's used to girls who drink cocktails and stay out all hours of the night." Anna had idly plucked an apple blossom which hung near.

"I'm sorry you don't like him," she had answered. "I'm going riding with "What!" Edgar's face had grown suddenly white. "And he's asked me to go to a college dance this winter, and I'm going,"

Anna had continued. "I'm sorry," he said. "I don't want you to have anything to do with Ned. But what I want doesn't make any difference, but I'm going to tell you something, just the same. I'm not much at saying things, but ever since I was a little kid, I've thought all the world of you. And I had hoped that in another year, maybe you would promise to marry me, and-and that we could live on my place, and be together all the

She had looked at him wonderingly. "Why, Edgar," she said finally, "I never cared for you like that." He had searched her eyes for a brief moment, and then dropped his head. "No," he had said softly, "I don't think that you do."

That was three years ago. Ned Howell had not come to take her auto riding; instead, he had gone away to visit a friend without so much as a word to her. And Edgar had left two days later for California to take charge of a farm his father had bought.

Suddenly a footstep sounded near by and a figure stood before her. "Anna!" someone said.

She caught her breath sharply, hardly daring to look up. But when finally she gained the courage, Edgar, blue eyes, smiled happily at her and held out his arms.

"I still care as I did when I was little kid," he said softly. (Copyright, 1917, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

GRASSHOPPER AND THE ANT

Irish Soldier in South Africa Giver Evidence of Philosophical Turn of Mind.

It was during the Boer war that an Irish soldier in South Africa, gingerly removing from his stew as much as he could find of a large, unwelcome grasshopper, was heard to remark, with praiseworthy resignation to the ways of Providence:

"The dhrumsticks of the baste is etill in it, worse luck! But if ate thim I must, thanks be to hiven that kapes the crayturs smaller than a

Mr. J. P. Kay, writing recently of his experiences "With Botha's Army," supplies a present-day pendant to the anecdote. He was visiting the lines of the Natal field artillery when, as he records, he almost tripped over a philosophic son of Erin eating his dinner.

"He was Irish, and he sat upon an apturned soap box and toyed with a dish of something that sounded like camp stew. There was a sudden noise, the sort of noise that makes a grown-up say to a child, 'You should put your hand before your mouth when you do that,' and I heard mather than saw the superphilosopher clear his mouth of some objectionpale eye closed with mine.

"'Praise the saints!' he said. "Thim ants have no bones into thim!"

-Pledge the President-NEGRO WOMEN CAN'T VOTE IN DEMOCRATIC PRIMARY, JULY 27TH.

Negro women will be prohibited from voting in the Democratic primary, July 27, by a resolution passed by the county executive committee Monday morning.

The resolution as adopted will permit "white Democrats only to cast a ballot in the primary.

Upon the urgent request of the candidates, the committeee voted not to hold a second Democratic primary to vote on aspirants for county offices. Under provisions of a law passed at the last session of the legislature, a second primary for county candidates can be held if ordered by the county executive committee. The "run-off" primary for state and district offices will be held August 24.
