For years the Wisconsin station has been carrying on experiments having in view the determining of a number of things relative to nitric nitrogen in the soil. Among the things to be found out were (1) the variableness of nitric nitrogen in the soil during the growing season; (2) the difference in amounts of nitric nitrogen in fallow soil and soil in crops; (3) the influence of cultivation on the formation of this element; (4) the influence of nitrates on the thrifty versus the yellow and withered plants; (5) the varianger ess of the nitric supply in and between rows of corn; (6) the difference in supply of nitrogen in soil and well water; (7) the discovery of an securate saethod of determining the

A few of the conclusions reached may be summarized as follows: In dividing the soil into foot layers to s depth of four feet, the greatest changes were found in the foot next the surfact. in this top layer the supply of nitrie nitrogen veried greatly throughout the growing season. The amount in the spring was small, but increased rapidly during the first three months of growth, reaching their maximum amount in June or July, according to the kind of crop being grown upon the fields. During July, when crops are growing most vigorously, the nitrinitrogen rapidly decreases till the first part of August, after which it remains quite constant in the surface layer. in the other layers little change is observed.

The value of frequent cultivation is apparently in the more rapid accumulation of nitric nitrogen rather than in the mere conservation of moisture. was found that stirring the soil once per week, as compared with the stirring of it once in two weeks, left the soil stirred, after 91 days, with 98.16 as compared with 52.41 pounds of altric nitrogen per million of dry soiin the second series of experiments which covered 258 days the soil stirred once per week had acquired a mean of 225.4!, parts and that once in two weeks 158.79 parts per million of dry soil showing the largest gains with the more frequent cultivation. The amounts of nitric nitrogen were found greatest between the rows o' corn, as they were coming into tassel, and least directly beneath hills, except in the surface six inches, and in the fourth foot where the relations were slightly reversed. The amounts of nitric nitrogen are less in the deeper ground water wells of this vicinity than in the soil, moisture of the fourth foot, the nitrie narrogen being only about one-third of the amount Observations indicate that when the textural equilibrium of soils is destroyed in the presence of sailts in solution, reflocculation and regranulation of the soil may take out of solution a portion. of the saits teaving a smaller per cent

How So Many of His Friends Did Not Get Their Ballots Counted.

The late Alonzo Starkey of Brattleboro, Vt., who was sheriff or deputy sheriff of Windham county continuously more than forty years, had a good story on himself that he enjoyed telling for the benefit of "cock-sure" aspirants for political office.

Mr. Starkey was a conscientious official of wide reputation, bubbling over with native wit. After serving a term as sheriff he yielded to the persuasion of his friends and stood for re-election, going to the county convention 'confident," as he expressed it, "that the thing was as good as settled" in
