Parent Shifts Burden of Child to the Teacher

Unless we revise our way of training children in the public schools, we may presently find that we have reared a generation of "jaded old youngsters" utterly devoid of a sense of value.

This is the warning Dr. William Ernest Hocking, professor of philosophy at Harvard, issued to a school teachers' convention in Ohio recently.

Teaching children how to solve problems in arithmetic, how to spell, how to reel off the names of the presidents, and how to bound the state of Kentucky, Dr. Hocking suggests, is pretty nearly useless unless, at the same time the mental and emotional training which will enable them to get something out of their lives besides the empty repetition of a monotonous routine.

Now the significant thing about this is the fact that the speaker seems to take it for granted that the youngsters are to get this kind of development in the school rather than in the home.

One of the most profound changes any human society could undergo has been taking place in this country in recent years, and most of us have hardly noticed it.

We have not only given to our schools the job of teaching our children how to read and write; we have, to a very great extent, also given them the task of developing our children's character, establishing their ideals, and suggesting to them the approaches to adulthood.

A home illustration will show the trend. Hardly anyone spans his child any more; and while that may be an excellent thing, the old-time firmness of parental discipline has pretty largely vanished at the same time.

It has been transferred to the school room. The child whose parents "can't do a thing with him"—and his name is legion, nowadays—takes the mark in school very obediently.

He has to. He knows teachers will make it hot for him if he doesn't.

Now this is merely a symbol of the way in which we have transferred parental responsibilities to the school ma'am. The only reason why we are not raising the most spoiled brats the world ever knew is that the schools are doing our work for us.

It is for that reason that Dr. Hocking's warning is timely. It calls on the educators to recognize that they have been given a responsibility which, from time immemorial, has rested on the parent.

A whole lot of politicians are spending about all their time talking about the high cost of electricity. That is one of the smallest items that enters into the family budget. Why not change their drive to the reduction of taxes? Electric rates seem to be going down and taxes going up. Let's get after the ones that are going up instead of those whose rates are going down.

Coronado's heart gave a leap of joy when the village of Quivira was sighted. The 42 days journey had come to an end—fame and fortune were within a hand's grasp. He and his 50 men entered the city triumphantly, starting back at the curious inhabitants who stared at them. It was strange, he thought—and wondered if his companions were thinking the same thing—that no gold and silver was evident. One Indian had a shining copper piece around his neck, but Coronado saw nothing else that even resembled a precious stone. By the end of the day he knew that he was to find nothing else. There were no precious metals at Quivira. There was neither gold nor silver, nor wealth of any sort, unless one could say that buffalo hides and corn were wealth. His entire exploration was a failure.

Some historians say that Coronado reached a northern part as far as the eastern half of the Kansas and Nebraska border. Although his exact route is not known, it is probable that he went almost as far as the present site of Wichita, Kan. It is possible to say for certain only that he spent the winter on the prairies "west of the Mississippi and south of the Missouri." He may have gone into Central Eastern Texas.

With a heavy heart Coronado went back to Tiguex, where he had left the main army. Those who had been with him at Quivira knew that there was no treasure to search for. Those who remained at Tiguex, bitterly disappointed, thought that a more thorough exploration should be made. Most of the men were tired of the hardships. They wanted to go home, back to their families and a peaceful life.

Preparations were made for the trip back to New Spain. Friar Juan de Padilla watched the preparations being made with just a tiny pang of loneliness in his heart. But, he would not exchange his position with any of the men, as much as he would like to be in New Spain once more. Juan Padilla wanted to remain in the land and continue his missionary work. Keepink with him Andres Docampo, a Portuguese, five Indians; a few negroes, two lay brethren, Lucas and Sebastian, a half-blood boy and two servants from Mexico, Friar Padilla told his friends goodbye. His career was to be successful until jealous and stupid Indians killed him when he tried to include other tribes in his teachings.

Coronado was rather silent on the uneventful trip homeward. He dreaded the meeting with the Viceroy, for he was returning empty handed.
