Being a Child Prodigy Means Missing the Joys of Youth

If we can believe all we are told, we seem to have a new infant prodigy in our midst-that 7-year-old New York lad who has been found by psychologists to be a boy in a million because of his exceptional brain development.

This child has an intelligence quotient of 196-a bare nine points below the mark set by the great Einstein himself. He can discuss astronomy intelligently, his father hesitates to talk politics with him because the youngster assusually gets so far ahead of him, and he uses four-fit words in the most casual conversation.

Nature apparently has performed another of her freakish stunts here; and while it is fascinating to speculate on the things that such a precocious child might accomplish, if he could be shown how to make the best use of his powers, one's chief emotion on reading the story is a feeling of pity for the youngster.

For no matter what the possession of such an abnormally developed brain may augur for the future, the one immediate probability is that this prodigy, like most others of his kind, will have a fairly thin kind of childhood.

One of the nicest things about being a child is the fact that you don't know very much and can't understand very champagne during September rep- in France, making the total sales like the note Austria sent Serbia resented about one-third of the for Rheims, Epernay and Chalons at the beginning of the World we much. You move in an incomprehensible world, in which the strangest things happen for no reason, that you can discover; but it is a world of wonder, even if it occasionally is a bit terrifying, and since you have no particular mental responsibility you can devote yourself to the joy of simply being alive in a way that is never afterward quite pos-

Childhood, in other words, is an enchanted sort of time. There are a great many things to learn and a great many things to understand; and the contemplation of them brings the dreaming of dreams and the seeing of visions, so that the world takes on a light that it will never hold

Now a youngster who has almost an Einsteinian intellect at the age of 7 is going to miss all of that. Ahead of his time, he is going to be plumped upagainst the perplexities and riddles of adult life, which range all the way from worry over the political situation to a solemn contemplation of those profound mysteries which can never be solved this side of the grave.

When life does that to a child, it cheats him. This lad may go on to do great things when he is grown; meanwhile, he is apt to be robbed of his normal childhood.

Right now is a good time to let loose a campaign of well planned newspaper advertising.
