Pupils to Present Health Play For Meeting of Lions

Mrs. George Robinson, teacher in Hodges Oak Park school, will present a group of her 7th grade health class pupils in a play before the Lions Club Thursday noon at the regular meeting in the Gholson Hotel colonial room.

The play is entitled, "Changing 'Careless City' into 'Careful City,'" and is particularly appropriate during this week when every mind is occupied with Ranger's own "Clean-up Campaign."

The play was presented last week before the P. T. A. of Hodges Oak Park and Mrs. Robinson and her pupils have received a great deal of praise for their excellent work in presenting the play.

The total number of farms in Eastland county during the five-year period between the regular federal census of 1930 and the 1935 agricultural census just completed, according to Ernest E. Wood, supervisor of the census. This was an increase of almost 100 farms a year put into cultivation, as the federal census was taken in the late spring of 1930 and the agricultural census was taken the first of the year.

The total number of farms in cultivation in Eastland county, according to the census of 1930 was 1,990, while the 1935 agricultural census showed the number had increased to 2,425. The latter figure is a preliminary count and is subject to correction by the supervisor of the census.

The increase in the number of acres in cultivation was not included in the preliminary report.

MAROONS WIN FROM WHITES HERE MONDAY

The "Maroons," captained by Mellinger Jacoby, defeated the "Whites," captained by Dean Walsh, in a spring training football game at Lillard field Monday afternoon in almost ideal football weather. The score was, Maroons 6, Whites 0.

The Maroons outwitted the Whites, it appeared from the sidelines, but what the Whites lacked in manpower in the line they made up for in aggressiveness, fighting their heavier opponents throughout the game.

The lone touchdown came in the second period when Rhodes of the Maroons completed a fluke pass to Burnett, who raced 30 yards to a touchdown. The pass tipped the fingers of a couple of defensive players before dropping into Burnett's arms, though Durwood (Lefty) Hartin almost overtook the ball carrier before the goal line was reached.

Outstanding on the offense for the Maroons were Jacoby, who played in the backfield, and Rhodes, while for the Whites Walsh and Paul Adkins did most of the ground gaining.

Bunton, center for the Reds, was outstanding on the defense, while Hartin, Walsh and Lemmie Bray and Bill Payton turned in good defensive games for the Whites.

Rhodes did the punting for the Maroons with Payton punting for the Whites and Walsh getting off one quick kick, which his team recovered for a first down.

The Whites had their opportunity to score when two passes carried the ball to the one-yard line on first down, but they lacked the punch to push over the winning touchdown. They had the Maroons on the defensive throughout the last period, despite predictions from the grandstand that the heavier Reds would wear them out in the last few minutes of play. Contrary to earlier predictions they showed up stronger in the last five minutes than their opponents, and game ended with them still threatening to take the game.

EUROPE ASTIR OVER THREATS OF GREAT WAR

Europe with a large part of its population in mental panic over danger of war, moved today toward a showdown on armaments.

Britain prepared to go to the Stresa conference with France and Italy Thursday to make an effort to bring Germany into an agreement and block any effort by France and other powers to take strong action against Germany.

Britain was understood to have invited Germany to submit new suggestions for a collective security system.

The French cabinet met, however, and was understood to have determined on a firm stand for her own security and the curbing of Germany in Eastern Europe. It was believed a general European arms conference would be suggested.

Berlin proceeded quietly on its way, waiting for the other powers to show their hands. It was disclosed that two "pocket" battleships are being built which exceed the tonnage limitations of the Versailles treaty and are to be heavily armed. The country was mostly pre-occupied by patriotic tributes with a militaristic trend to Gen. Erich Ludendorff, its famous war time leader.

Hawaii Sets Example of U.S.-Japan Amity

Every nation seems to need some pet enemy to fear—some class or group on whom can be focused all the vague suspicions and distrusts which are a part of nervous and restless modern life.

For modern America that role seems to be filled just now by the Japanese. Some of us can give ourselves the jitters just by repeating the word Japan over and over. Japan as a foreign power, Japanese as dwellers in our midst—either way, we unload our vague uneasiness on them.

Now there is no bit of American soil with as many Japanese residents as Hawaii; and it is worth while, therefore, to see whether this timorousness is shared out there. If it isn't, it ought to be a pretty good sign that our fears are overdrawn.

There is at hand a special edition of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, printed recently to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the first Japanese settlers in Hawaii; and all people who think that trying to get white Americans and Japanese to live harmoniously side by side is like trying to mix oil and water ought to have a look at it.

For this edition presents a glimpse at a Japanese community which is about as thoroughly Americanized as anyone could wish. Living on an island in mid-Pacific, these Hawaiian Japanese are looking toward Washington and not toward Tokio.

The very advertisements have an American ring—as, for instance, a cheery broadside from the "Young Men's Buddhist Association."

And there is in it an article by a Japanese resident of the islands pleading for understanding by white Americans of the Japanese-American's viewpoint. This Japanese—born under the American flag, educated in American schools, proud of his position as an American citizen—says bluntly:

"What more can you expect from a man than that he be willing to sacrifice his life for his country, if necessary? I hope to God that this country will not be involved in another war, but if it does you will find the New Americans fighting among the front ranks for the Stars and Stripes . . ."

"Our blood and our hearts thrill at the sound of the 'Star-Spangled Banner.' We hold sacred the great heritage given us by the framers of the American government."

The moral of all this is almost too clear to need explanation. It has proved possible for the two races to get along in harmony on an isolated group of islands; and since that is true, those of use who never see a Japanese from one year's end to another ought to be able to calm our fears.

These "inevitable enemies" seem to become very good friends, once anyone takes the pains to meet them halfway.

Ernest Thompson on the Firing Line

Chairman E. O. Thompson of the Texas railroad commission is on the banks of the Potomac. Thompson knows where to find his hat. He never closes his eyes or his ears, and when it is necessary to move his tongue he knows how to talk. He expressed the opinion in a formal statement that the Thomas oil bill should be killed in committee "in the interest of the state and the nation, and recognized efforts of the government." Elmer Thomas is the democratic senator from Oklahoma. This is the warning of the red-headed battler:

"If this (Thomas bill) is passed it will serve as an entering wedge for regimentation of all industry. There is no conceivable necessity for this drastic legislation. It is undoubtedly unconstitutional. . . will retard the recovery and cause chaos in the third largest American industry. It seeks to change our system of government and violates every principle of sovereignty of the states in expressed contradiction of President Roosevelt's public utterance on the oil question under date of April 3, 1933. An overwhelming majority of the industry in oil producing states are opposed to this legislation."

It would be well for the lawmakers of Texas, senators and representatives, to "place their house in order," so to speak, and to heed the warning of the chairman of their important commission—which is handling the oil and gas treasure wealth interest of this commonwealth. Important bills are pending. They are said to be ready to be beaten into shape and passed on to the governor. There should be no delay. The regular session is marking time, and perhaps the most important of all the measures which concern Texas and Texans are those which deal with state control of the conservation of oil and gas—representing the great money revenue bearing industries of our state. Time is precious. Texans are for state control of their own affairs and these include the treasure wealth passed on by the framers of the first and last constitutions of this empire of the Southwest.

Community progress is synonymous with community effort.

'Dusting the Covers of Texas History' for The Texas Centennial Celebrations of 1936

"In the sacred cause of right, justice and humanity, it is no time to calculate cold policy and expediency—let us then do something for Texas!" The appealing editorial in the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin of April 4, 1836, expressed the sentiment of Louisiana citizens. With their neighboring State at war, they felt that it was only their rightful duty to go to aid them, and it was through the assistance of the New Orleans "Greys" that the Texas were able to have a good sized group of volunteers and helpers, though many of them did arrive almost too late for actual fighting.

Ever since June, 1835, when General Felix Huston made a "spirited and elegant harangue, describing in a manner exceedingly touching, the wrongs and sufferings of people of Texas," people of the United States had made attempts to help with food, clothing, and ammunition. Travis appealed earnestly from the Alamo for aid, but word reached New Orleans too late. "Still Texas is not enslaved," the Bulletin said, "and the very spirit which burned in the breasts of San Antonio's defenders is kindled in the hearts of every tenant of the wood cabin and throughout the wide extent of Texas." Thus the New Orleans Greys were organized, and sent to Texas.

Stephen F. Austin had made many friends for Texas on his various trips to New Orleans and Louisiana. His friendship and kindness was repaid by the volunteers. They hoped to find the war only a temporary clash, and were confident that Texans would be triumphant in a few weeks. Taking as their motto the Texas slogan of "Texas and Liberty!" they thoroughly sympathized and understood the Texan cause.

In the hundred years that have passed since those troublous days if battle, great changes have taken place. The Louisiana Advertiser said: "Texas holds out a great field for the adventurous and enterprising population of our states, and soon all its vast prairies will be covered with the habitations of the thrifty and the industrious, and all its vast resources will become gradually developed under the fostering care of a government administered by judicious and enlightened men."

Because it has gradually developed to be what it is today, Texas will celebrate its hundredth anniversary with fitting commemorations in 1936, noting the passing of the hundred years which have fulfilled all hopes.

BEGIN HERE TODAY

Miss Graves, secretary to Dringgold, finds her notebook in which Dringgold had dictated a confession. She rushes away, registers at a hotel under an assumed name. Her stepson, Robert Caise, offers her a job in a shop where she is taken into a room, then takes her, introducing her as his secretary. She meets Hap's son, who is the stepson, Robert Caise, Hap's.

"It happens," she said, "that I am going to make quite a bit of difference to you."
"I'm sure I don't care to discuss it with you," Millicent said, "and if you wouldn't mind leaving the room, I have some work to do."
"When I leave," Vera Duchene said savagely, "I'll take this dress with me."
"Go ahead and take it if you want to," Millicent remarked with a great show of indifference.
Her manner puzzled the maid. She stared at Millicent for a few seconds, then said in a more conciliatory tone, "But I don't want to get you into trouble, dearie."
"Don't call me dearie!" Millicent told her, "and go ahead and make all the trouble you want. By the time you're through we'll find out just where we stand."
"Now wait a minute," Vera Duchene said. "Don't misunderstand me. We're all of us open to suspicion on some things and we've all of us got to stand together."
"What do you mean by that?"

home about 11 o'clock, and came into your room for a chat; that I'd heard that Mr. Hap had employed a new secretary and I came in to get acquainted. You could say that we sat up and talked for an hour or so, and then you suggested that I stay here with you and that I slept here until early in the morning when I went to my own room to change my clothes. That would give both of us an alibi and protect us from having the police ask unnecessary questions."
For a moment Millicent thought this might be a trap. Then she saw the anxiety in Vera Duchene's eyes and realized that the maid was making the offer in good faith.
The temptation almost overwhelmed Millicent. Here was the opportunity to give herself a perfect alibi. Here would be a chance to positively disclaim ownership of the handkerchief.
But Millicent realized that this was only a temptation. She could not bring herself to concoct such a deliberate falsehood.
Slowly she shook her head. Savage rage twisted Vera Duchene's features. "You've got to," she said.
"I won't."
"I tell you you will."
"I tell you I won't. Get out of my room."
"I'll get out fast enough," Vera Duchene said savagely. "You think over what I've told you. If you haven't a different answer for me within two hours, I'm going to take this dress directly to Detective Buchanan."
"Go ahead," Millicent said. "See if I care."
"And don't worry," the maid went on, "but what Detective Buchanan will put you over the jumps. By the time I get done with him he'll realize this is one of the most significant pieces of evidence uncovered in connection with the entire case."

"Yes," Millicent said. "I noticed you were handing him that line about being a big strong man and he was lapping it up like a cat lapping up cream."

Vera Duchene smiled sweetly and said, "Thank you, my dear. You haven't seen anything yet."

With that she stepped into the corridor, banging the door behind her.

Millicent stared at the door, feeling suddenly as though life had betrayed her into a series of circumstances with which she was powerless to cope. All of her troubles were due to the woman in the black ermine who had tricked her into an appearance of guilt in the Dringgold murder case.

However, she resolved that she would go directly to Jarvis Hap and make a complete statement of her case to him, and then do whatever he suggested.

Her chin in the air, she left her room, walked down the corridor to the door of Jarvis Hap's study.

The door was ajar. She knocked at it. There was no answer. She pushed the door open.

There was no one in the room. Millicent felt a wave of disappointment sweep over her. She had been counting more than she herself realized upon the strong personality of the mysterious man who employed her. The more she saw of Hap the more she began to believe it was impossible for him to be implicated in the Dringgold murder, and certainly he was her friend. He had information enough about her to put her in the hands of the police at any moment. Instead, he had befriended her.

She was turning to go when her eyes fell on the typewritten page on which she had written for Buchanan, the detective, the words "pond," "keys," the letters of the alphabet, and other symbols by which Buchanan had definitely ascertained that the note, describing the location of the keys, had been written upon the same typewriter.

Moved by some swift impulse, Millicent picked up this paper, folded it, and then left the study. She left the door ajar just as she had found it, walked down the corridor to her own room, and was in time to see Richard Gentry climb the stairs. He advanced toward her, smiling with outstretched hand.

"Well, well," he said, "here's our new secretary. Tell me, have you opened the books yet?"

She thought there was something mocking in his eyes. "No," she said.

His face showed surprise. "Why not? I thought you were supposed to do it."

"I'm supposed," she said, "to take my orders from Mr. Hap."

"Meaning that he told you not to open the set of books?"

"Meaning that you will have to discuss the matter with Mr. Hap."

"Oh, well," he said breezily, "there's no need for us to get at sword's points over it. I was a little bit nervous last night. I guess I've been smoking too much or something, and I certainly made a fool of myself. I want to apologize and I hope you'll forget the things I said to you. My accounts are absolutely clean and open. There's nothing whatever for me to worry about, as long as you're square and aboveboard. Of course, if you started juggling records around, I might have some explaining to do, but I think you're going to give me a fair deal."

"Whatever records you think I would juggle records around?" she asked.

"Oh, I don't know," he said. "I guess I was nervous and just got suspicious of everyone."

"Well," she said, "you didn't act as though you were nervous last night. You acted more as though you had a guilty conscience."

He looked at her meaningfully and said, "Well, as far as that's concerned, I guess we all of us have guilty consciences. We're not any of us perfect. Do you think so?"

"That depends," she said, "on what you mean by perfection. If you'll excuse me, I've got work to do."

She went to her own room, opened the door and closed it carefully. She had placed the note informing her that the woman in the black ermine coat was in the house in a place where she was certain it would never be found—a place under a corner of the carpet.

Now she went to that corner of the carpet, inserted her fingers and pulled out the folded paper.

If her surmise was correct Norman Hap had slipped that note under her door.

But when she spread the note out and compared it with the specimen of typewriting from the machine in Jarvis Hap's office, she suddenly realized that both had been written on the same machine. There was the same slant to the "L," the same chip from the edge of the "W."

Her eyes widened incredulously. Was it possible that Norman Hap could have written that anonymous note about the keys being in the bottom of the pond? She knew that she must see Hap at once. She . . .

She broke off as knuckles sounded on her door.

"Who's there?" she asked. A voice crisp with authority said "Sergeant Mahoney, of the homicide squad. Open up, please."

"Well," Millicent asked, trying to keep curiosity from showing in her voice.

"I'm afraid," Vera said, "if the police should check up on me, they'd find I didn't get in until quite a bit later than I would like to have them think. Also they might find that I was with someone who might have some embarrassing explanations to make. You know how those things are, dearie . . . that is, Miss Graves."

NEW ELECTRIC Refrigerators

FOR AS LITTLE AS

$81.50

f. o. b. Fort Worth

Price is no longer a major consideration in buying a new electric refrigerator. Mass production and simplified design have made possible new model refrigerators selling for as low as $81.50, with term payments of only a few dollars a month. These new "lift-top" models were designed for small families, small apartments, small cafes and other places where refrigeration of food is foremost and a large storage capacity isn't needed.

The economy in price is only one of the advantages of these "lift-tops." They also use very little electricity—less than a nickel a day according to many owners.

What Kind Did You Get?

When Mrs. Brown tells Mrs. Smith about the new car, Mrs. Smith is pretty sure to ask, in genuine, friendly interest, "What kind did you get?" With a new piano, a hot-water heater, or a package of pastry flour, it's likely to be the same... For names mean something to every wise woman.

The name of any commercial product is of interest only because its maker has made it mean something... has made it stand for definite qualities in the public mind. And that very fact provides one of the greatest helps to better living. If you're a regular reader of advertising, you know what you are getting—and you get your money's worth.

There is no element of risk in the purchase of any article advertised in the columns of this newspaper. So make the advertising columns your guide. They will save you time, money and effort... and bring you better things.

starts at the table

How you feel and how you depend largely on the foods you eat. The balanced menu provides "bulk" to prevent common constipation—caused by lack of the essential fiber.
Common constipation causes headaches, loss of appetite and energy. Yet, in most cases can be overcome pleasantly and safely by eating a delicious Kellogg's All-Bran. A good food for normal individuals. It provides "bulk" in convenient concentrated form. All-Bran provides vitamin B and iron.
Isn't this sunny way better than taking patent medicines? Two spoonfuls of All-Bran daily usually sufficient. Chronic constipation with each meal. If relief is obtained, see your doctor.
Serve All-Bran as a cereal use in cooking. Get the red-and-green package at your grocer's. Made by Kellogg in Battle Creek.
