Book Formula Breaks Down in Real Life

A young Chicago woman, discovering that her husband was infatuated with another woman, committed suicide so that the two sweethearts would be free to marry. But a day or so after the funeral, the other woman discovered that this blazing love affair had cooled her off to a mere glow, and was getting cooler every moment; so she announced that the stuff was off, and that the marriage would never take place.

"He took me around a little, but the only present he ever gave me was a box of candy," she explained. "I don't think I love him and I doubt if I'll ever see him again. I'm tired of him.'

Just what the shade of the first wife thinks of all this is not recorded, nor is the re-action of the man in the case recorded; but a casual newspaper reader, meditating over this tragic and useless affair, can only conclude that all the parties involved must have been reading too many modern novels.

The moden novelist, who feels that he has been emancipated from all the old romantic traditions, is really more of a slave to romantic tradition than any of his predecessors, and the tradition which has enslaved him is this: that when two people discover they are in love, it is their high no matter how many wives, husbands, children, or disapproving relatives may stand in the way.

If you are up on current literature, you will recognize that tradition at once. Over and over again the story is told; how John, happily married, meets Mary, also hap- HAVE AID OF EASTLAND SCRIBE pily married, and how they kindle a great and overpowering flame between themselves, so that it is eternally right and proper for them to discard their present helpmates trict No. 13 "supervisor of writers' tory, architecture, geology and re-(at whatever cost in tears and heartaches) and devote project" under the works progress sources of the 11 counties of this themselves to the feeding of this great new flame of ir- administration, will have the as- WPA district. Somehow it seems to work out pretty well-in books. But when it is copied in real life it generally produces a grand mess; and now and then it brings about a miserable, needless tragedy like this one in Chicago.
