'Production for Use'-Its Real Meaning

The next time you hear someone talking about "production for use," stop and thing it over. A moment's reflection will show you that all production is for use, and that the phase, unless further explained, simply doesn't mean anything.

Americans have generally believed that more goods would be produced, and that they would be cheaper and more widely distributed, under private ownership and free competition than under any other system. Socialists, Communists, and various shades of radicals believe that more goods will be produced, and more people will be able to buy them, under some kind of a centralized governmental system without private profits.

But the object is precisely the same in both cases, to produce as many goods as possible and distribute them as widely as possible. The difference is only in the method -that is, who shall say how much shall be produced and how it shall be distributed.

Shall public functionaries hired by the state make the decisions and administer them, or shall the decisions of millions of private individuals, urged on by the hope of private profit and curbed only by the limitations of their own efficiency and the purchasing power of the public?

Russia for the last 20 years has been engaged on the first large-scale trial of the state theory. Whether that system will be able to outshine the American system in the actual physical results demanded remains yet to be seen.

But what the American system can do, and has done may be seen merely by looking about. In the wide distribution of a multitude of goods, it would be hard to match any other country's achievements against those of this

In an advertisement recently, one big electric company produced some data that is very interesting, pointing out how much cheaper electric light bulks are than they were in 1921. But in the course of their argument they brought in some other things that are even more significant.

In 1900, for instance, not one family in a hundred had a horse and buggy. Yet today three out of four families have autos. In 1900, one family in 13 had a telephone, while today every other family has one. In 1900 fewer than 500,000 homes had electricity. Today 21,000,000 homes are wired, 7,000,000 have electric refrigerators. 22,000,000 have radios.

All this means that, in spite of many lamentable shortcomings of the present system in America, it has done a great deal toward distributing to those who work the fruit of their labor-that is, the goods produced.

It is not a good enough record, even yet. There is much to be done. But a pertinent question to ask of the discontented is: "Who has done better?"

ARE these commandments given to ancient Israel binding upon the Christian conscience?

That is a question that is often asked today, and it is a very important question; for the modern world certainly is breaking some of these commandments on an extensive scale, and the breaking of them is often upheld by the teachers and leader, of religion whom we would most expect to uphold the commandments.

Take the command, for instance, "Thou shalt not kill."

Think of the exceptions that we so readily set alongside that commandments in the light of this larger command of love to God and love man to man, at the spirit of which alone the commandments of his religion positive and not negative.
