Rulers With the Morals of Kidnapers

The world, during the past 30 years, has grown callouses on its conscience.

We are no longer shocked at things which would have horrified our grandfathers. It would take a book (and a good book, too) to explore all the reasons. War, like any cause that makes men believe that the end justifies the means, breaks down morality. So does revolution. And the world has had plenty of both since 1911.

Perhaps a nation has no morals, properly speaking. But its leaders have, or should have, and what they do unfortunately must pass at any given time for the morals of their people.

Sinking of helpless freight ships, bombing of defenseless civilians, women and little children-all these we have beer aught to accept. But there is one phase of current immorality that no body seems to notice at all. That is the growing practice of making a man's innocent famiby suffer for what he has done, or using the threat of such reprisals as a club over him. We think of kidnaping as the lowest form of crime because the suffering of a victim is paraded before his loved ones to compel them to bow to the will of the kidnaper. Morality can sink no lower.

Yet it has become established practice in Europe. Russia has the dubious honor of having pioneered the field. No one will ever know how many innocent people have been slain because relatives displeased the regime. How many have been held in line by fear of what might happen to their innocent dear ones? In Germany the same techniques have been applied, with a long arm that reaches across the Atlantic. How many Germans and Italians in America, North and South, have been coerced into support of the axis because of threats and fear of what may happen to their relatives in the old country if they do makers on the NTSTC campus, adnot fall in line?

Now in Norway it is announced that the property of | 500 girls this year. Having no families of all men who aided the British in their raid on qualms about learning all the the Lofoten Islands, or who went away with them, will be burned. "Reprisals!" cries the Nazi newspaper in Norway, ing copkies that don't fall to get- Blanco County rather inglerious-Fritt Folk.
