Decay at the Core

Every large city in the United States, and some not so large, face the same problem, says Frederick L. Ackerman, New York architect and planner. Their course has run along this line:

First, a spectacular growth during the first 30 years of this century, until more than half of the American population was living in the cities. Then the rate of urban growth declined, and in some cities the actual population is decliling. From the expanding central area now moves a continual migration of people to the suburbs and even the country.

There are many reasons for this migration, but they boil down to this; many people weighed the comparison and found that life was better farther out. Whereupon the congested urban area stagnated still further and became a "problem area."

We are now, Ackerman says, in a replacement era, the original development era having played out. He believes the cities must seize that period of replacement to devlop the stagnated central areas into the most desirable residence districts of the city.

But that sort of development will no longer take care of itself. The cities grew by themselves, without direction or plan. But the replacement era will not work that way. It must be planned.

High valuation due to overhanging capitalization stands in the way of private efforts to accomplish such rebuilding. Ackerman puts it thus: "We have built our cites under guidance of the same economic fallacy which accounts for the plight of our railroads. We failed to extinguish their capitalizations at rates corresponding to physical decay and obsolescence, whichever was the higher. In a world of unprecedented advance in science, the urban CHRISTIAN SCIENCE center has stood firm against change, either in respect to SERVICES physical plan or fiscal policy, both of which are obsolete."

Such changes sound like a Spartan remedy, but no city which has a "blighted section" at its center can afford Churches of Christ, Scientist, on to see that heart of the city go to seed without making Sunday, June S. strenuous efforts to meet the problem before it is too late.
