Spending, but No 'Spree'

The vast sums of money which have been poured into

The makings of the kind of a "silk-shirt spending spree" like that which swept across the country in World, War days and directly afterward are all present. But there is a difference, and that difference is all to the good.

The America that comes into this period of "war prosperity" is a different America from the one which entered that of 1916-1920. We have been chastened a bit; many have had a hard struggle during the past 10 years; we do not have the same child-like confidence that good times will go on forever.

This thought, down in the mind of almost every American, has tempered the potential "spending spree" thus far. For many weeks after employment began to leap forward, retail sales generally did not reflect the advanced purchasing power, even in towns where its presence was obvious. One reason is that many, many people had obligations which they wanted to clear up before they did anything directly for themselves. Money orders went steaming out of defense centers to "the folks back home." People wanted to clear the decks of debt and obligation while they could; then if the whole thing collapsed, they would at least start even.

Now those who have a finger on the business pulse say that money from fattened pay envelopes is beginning toflow into direct retail trade. Faced with the realization that certain kinds of goods may be hard to get at any price, even the expected higher prices, people are buying. But they are buying more solidly, earefully, than they did' he that other "war boom." They are buying things that they really need, and things that will last awhile. Dealers report a large proportion of cash sales.

There is no reason at all why people, especially people who have been in pinched circumstanges during the past 10 years, should not buy the things they have long wanted. There is no reason, in the midst of our great food surpluses, wh ythey should not buy the food so long denied to so many.

Setting to the sale

When that has been done, there is always the Defense Bond savings plan into which prudent people may put surpluses, why they should not buy the food so long dement in the present emergency, helping to avoid undue price rises due to excess bidding for restricted amounts of goods, and at the same time piling up a backlog for their own security against the time when deflation may follow the present rising tide.
