MAJOR ISSUES FACE CONGRESS AT OPENING

WASHINGTON, Jan 10 (UP)—The Seventy-Eighth Congress opened its second session Monday with an agenda crowded with politically explosive issues whose outcome may have major repercussions in the coming presidential election.

In the Senate, the pending $2,275,000,000 tax bill tops the calendar. Weighted with a hotly disputed provision virtually emasculating the war contract renegotiation act, it seems destined for acid debate.

Both Speaker Sam Rayburn and House Republican Leader Joseph W. Martin Jr. are agreed that the House military affairs committee has not settled on a range of pay. More political dynamite resides in the soldier vote question which must be ironed out soon if the overseas armed forces are to be maintained on page three.

War Manpower Commission Believes Problem is Licked
Barkley's Political Fate Linked With Roosevelt

Special to Central Press

WASHINGTON—Word is going the rounds in official Washington that the manpower problem has already probably passed its peak, and that from now on it may slacken a little until the collapse of Germany causes heavy war contract cancellations and wholesale release of workers.

Whether or not this assumption is correct, the War Manpower commission feels that it has now obtained a grip on the manpower problem, and that it has a working formula for solution of critical labor shortages.

As a result, talk of national service legislation is not expected to be stressed as much hereafter.

The formula used by the WMC in solving manpower shortages is as follows:

- 1—Determine what production and services in a given area are most urgent.
- 2—Establish manpower priorities, giving labor to industries and business establishments in relation to this urgency.
- 3—Guide workers to plants having priority, that is, make sure that any available labor is used where it is needed most.

WMC officials say that communities throughout the country are going after labor shortages in the right fashion.

AT 1690 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE in Washington stands what is probably the most jealously guarded home in all the western hemisphere—the White House.

Rep. Joe Martin (R) of Massachusetts, house minority leader, found out all about it the other day. He went to the White House to see the president following Mr. Roosevelt's return from the Teheran conference, but forgot to take his special identification card with him.

Soldiers, secret service agents, FBI men and others are under strict orders to take nothing for granted. "Either produce the pass or stay out," they told Martin.

Finally a senate member arriving for the same conference came along and, with the aid of Martin's Elk membership card, straightened the matter out to the satisfaction of all.

THE SWING TOWARD THE REPUBLICANS, pronounced in recent elections, is expected to place in jeopardy a number of Democratic senators up for reelection next year, including Majority Leader Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky.

In fact, there is an admitted possibility that the Republicans may exercise control of the senate in November, 1944.

It depends largely, of course, on the Republican presidential nominee and the kind of race he makes.

Barkley, who has served in the senate since 1927 and has been majority leader since 1937, is well aware of the situation.

His recent vote for the Truman-Crosser resolution legislating a pay raise of 5 cents an hour for non-operating railway workers is considered significant in view of the fact that the administration insists this resolution would destroy wage stabilization.

The general opinion is that, if President Roosevelt is nominated for a fourth term and wins, Barkley will win, and that if the president is nominated and is defeated Barkley will go down with him.

UNLIKELY TO BE APPRECIATED by the world outside is the effect on the circle close to President Roosevelt and the president himself of the recent death of Marvin McIntyre, secretary to the chief executive.

The president has always been intensely loyal to his friends, and his message on McIntyre's death was straight from the heart.

McIntyre had charge of the president's appointments. But the president often consulted him about tough problems, and "Mac's" spontaneous reactions were responsible for acceptance or rejection of many projects and . . .

McIntyre's outstanding characteristics were simplicity and love of people. He had a tremendous fund of anecdote.

Fast-Working Medical Corps Saves Wounded

U. S. ARMY HEADQUARTERS IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC (UP)

Surgical teams composed of top notch medical men and organized for split-second action have saved numerous lives in the South Pacific campaign. Army authorities reported today in recounting an incident which occurred in fighting on Bougainville recently.

An exploding Jap artillery shell sent a jagged fragment into the abdomen of a Marine, ripping his intestine from their anchorage to the body, fracturing his spine and his pelvic bone. First-aid men immediately took him to an Army hospital of the 37th (Ohio) division, which had just finished moving its equipment into a new location.

Army officials said the hospital had not yet been set up with complete facilities, but the wounded man, whose condition was pronounced "very critical," was placed on an operating table and the hospital's surgical team went to work.

Maj. Richard Shackelford, of Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore Md., was operating surgeon. He was assisted by Capt. Edward Klopfer of Columbus, O., and Capt. Samuel Lieberman of New York City. Enlisted assistants were Tech 4th class Clarence Newirth of Cleveland, O., and Tech 3rd class John J. Adams of Philadelphia.

The wounded man was given a blood transfusion and plasma to combat shock. Then the bleeding was halted, the wound and the torn intestines repaired and the wound packed with gauze to guard against infection.

Four days later, Army authorities said the man had a fighting chance to survive. His leg, which had been paralyzed, was responding to treatment and his bladder, also paralyzed, was functioning again.

Beware Coughs Following Flu

After the flu is over and gone, the cough that follows may develop into chronic bronchitis if neglected. Creomulsion relieves promptly because it goes right to the seat of the trouble to help loosen and expel germy laden phlegm, and aid nature to soothe and heal raw, tender, inflamed bronchial mucous membranes. No matter how many medicines you have tried, tell your druggist to sell you a bottle of Creomulsion with the understanding you must like the way it quickly allays the cough or you are to have your money back.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

BETH HAD BEEN correct in guessing that the single peeling of the doorbell meant that Dennis Archer had arrived. He was standing in the hall, probably not daring to venture into the living room, which was full of chattering girls.

Beth, taking in his appearance—he was wearing a dark suit and had in one hand a gray homburg, in the other a square floral box—thought he was the most distinguished male to appear in her time at the boarding house.

He glanced up when she appeared at the top of the stairs and, as inexperienced as Beth Kinnan was, she read the appreciation in his eyes at once. Her smart clothes and a new hair-do had quite transformed her and, in the transformation, anticipation had also played a part. Beth was not aware of it, but her attractions were more than equal to Andrea's.

He said, "So prompt. Do you have all the virtues?"

He gave her the box and, opening it, Beth saw it contained a flawless orchid, a single one. It was so perfect, so fragile, so touching because it was the first one she ever had been given, she couldn't speak for a moment.

She said, "It's beautiful, Mr. Archer, and I've never had one before." She pinned it to her shoulder as she stood before the mirror, never noticing that the bloom in her cheeks did not come out of a rouge pot, because she was thinking that Andrea would never have admitted it was her first orchid. She wondered how she could get through the evening without divulging to her escort that she was a thoroughly mouse-like creature.

They got into a taxi and Dennis gave an address on M street to the driver. "It's the Salle du Bois. The food is rather good. I hope you'll like it. The place is quiet, but you may choose a gayest spot wherever you'd like to go later."

There were thick carpets at the Salle du Bois, which was done in a pale modern decor. It was pleasantly lighted and marked with an air of luxurious, obsequious service, this famous restaurant, and Beth thought it was the most beautiful place she had ever been in. She didn't fail to note the special attentions paid to her host, the selection of their table, the almost tender solicitude of their waiters. She thanked her lucky stars that she had bought herself a new outfit.

Dennis ordered Dubonnet cocktails, vichyssoise—an experience in epicurean delight—breast of chicken, glass, endive salad and a champagne of unknown origin. Even as he had ordered dinner, consulting and choosing for her, he led her along the conversational path she had rather dreaded. What one talked about with the Dennis Archers was something she didn't know, but she imagined all sorts of brilliant conversation. Before she realized it, she was sketching a picture of life in Mr. Slade's office, being not unamusing in her observations. Beth was one of the instinctively wise girls who knew when to talk and when to listen. In time she began to draw him out. It was 10 o'clock before either of them realized it.

"Now where would you like to go?" he asked.

Beth spread her hands in a helplessness gesture. "I've seen all the monuments," she said, "and been to all the movies. Andrea—it was the first time she had mentioned her name—and I went to tea one day to the Mayflower. Outside of that, Washington hot spots are a complete mystery to me, but could we . . . could we go where there's music?"

"You can go anywhere you want to, Miss Beth. There's El Patio, where there's a lad who does magic on the piano keys. There's the King Cole room and the Casino Royale, and the Balalaika. Take your choice."

Beth's eyes shone. "I can't," she said helplessly. "I'm like a kid in a toy store. They all sound wonderful!"

"That settles it. We'll see as many as we can."

"That would be very expensive, wouldn't it?"

Dennis smiled and patted her gloved hand. "You let me worry about that. I think the Archer Mills can stand it. The chief has to have a little fun, you know."

"Don't you have lots of fun? I should think you should have seen everything, and done everything, and you'd have so many invitations you would have a hard time choosing among them."

"You make me feel like a bon vivant, something I am not. In fact, I'm often a lonely fellow . . . but not now. You're giving me a memorable evening. Did you know that there are not many young women like you, Miss Beth Kinnan?"

Beth showed very pretty confusion. Vernon had told her much the same thing, but Vernon was not Dennis Archer.

He enlarged upon the theme of Beth's attractions. She was a wise young woman, he told her in better words than that as they sat out some of the dances at El Patio. It was then that he came to tell her much about himself. When he was a child, his family had money and he had been educated by tutors in the family home in Boston. He had traveled, living the summers of his childhood in Switzerland, France and Italy and, at 14, decided he was going into diplomatic service. At 16 his father and mother had died within four months of each other, and he was literally penniless.

"But you're young now and the owner of great mills! What did you do? How did it happen?"

"I had a guardian, my father's best friend, John Higganum. He took care of me, sent me to college, was the best father a lad could have. He died when I was a sophomore at Harvard. I left college and went into the mills."

Beth's memory flicked back over something she'd read or heard (Beatrice Higganum Archer). Things that Dennis was not telling her began to piece together. Beatrice Archer was the daughter of Dennis' guardian, the owner of the mills, and the young Dennis had married her.

"You married his daughter." Beth's mouth made a round little "O" when she realized what she had said, speaking her thoughts aloud.

"Yes," he said. "The mills really belonged to Beatrice when John died. They were going under. She had little interest in them, but we both wanted them saved. We reorganized and gave them my name."

"I see," she said.

"I was a scared kid in those days. Only 22 and head of a big business."

"Are you ever scared now?"

"Often," he admitted, "by things that you are too young to know. I'm scared of time that wings past me. When you're as young as you are, you're so busy with the present that you can't realize that one day the future looms up as something unknown, lonely."

"Can't it?" she said quietly. "I think I can."

"Perhaps," he said, watching the shadows come into her face, making it seem still and wistful. And again, "Perhaps, I am not surprised that rich streams of undervalued flow through you. There are rare women who know instinctively what they have not experienced. How unlike Andrea you are. How did you two ever get to be such close friends?"

"When you know Andrea," she replied, "that would not be hard to understand. Once Andrea is in your life, you always want her there." She told him about their earliest association, and the years since.

"I know," he told her. "Knowing Andrea is an experience. She's like music and warm sunshine, all the things that make you forget yourself. She's a wonderful girl—and you're a wonderful girl."

She found herself saying, "Andrea is very fond of you."

"I'm very fond of Andrea. I hope this chap's she's engaged to is the right one."

"Jim?" Beth's face came up shining. "Oh, yes! He's . . . he's fine, Dennis. And they love each other very much. Andrea is the luckiest girl in the world."

"So that's the way it is," Dennis Archer thought, and unconsciously he reached for her hand, which lay beside his own on the leather seat and he would have given it a touch of sympathy had he dared.

ballot in the presidential election and other major contests. The Senate jettisoned a measure for federal supervision of the overseas vote in favor of one putting the problem up to the states. The House still is considering the matter.

Senator Scott W. Lucas (Dem. of Illinois, coauthor of the original bill in the Senate, plans to submit a compromise giving the Federal Government control over overseas administration of the soldier vote but leaving other aspects to the states. The Army and Navy have said full state control is practically unworkable.

Food subsidies, a shopworn but still bitterly fought issue, will take the congressional spotlight again before many weeks have passed. The Commodity Credit Corporation, chief government dispenser of subsidy payments, will expire Feb. 17 unless renewed by Congress.

The House has voted an unqualified ban on food subsidies but the Senate is exploding prospects of a compromise that would permit limited survival of the program.

According to two reports, President Roosevelt's state of the Union message, expected Tuesday will recommend national compulsory service legislation.

The President this week or early next week will offer his 1945 fiscal year budget message, with sixty-five billion dollars generally viewed as the probable total. Enactment of a host of appropriation bills in the light of his request will be a prime task of this session.

ADVISES AGAINST COLD CURE
BOSTON (UP)—The whiskey treatment for colds is out, according to State Public Health Commissioner Vlado A. Getting. Dr. Getting says that whiskey and such stimulants only make the patient forget he is sick, and after they wear off the cold is still with him. The health commisner says the best cold remedy is a lot of sleep and plenty of liquids such as tea, coffee, milk and fruit juices.
